PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE SEVENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1802.

MONDAY, December 6, 1802.

In pursuance of the law of last session, the second session of the seventh Congress commenced this day, at the city of Washington, and the Senate assembled, in their Chamber, at the Capitol.

PRESENT:

SIMEON OLCOTT, from New Hampshire;
URIAH TRACY, from Connecticut;
CHRISTOPHER ELLERY, from Rhode Island;
STEPHEN R. BRADLEY, from Vermont;
SAMUEL WHITE, from Delaware;
ROBERT WRIGHT, from Maryland;
ABRAHAM BALDWIN, from Georgia.

WILLIAM PLUMER, appointed a Senator by the State of New Hampshire, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of JAMES SHEAFE, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the Senate.

The number of members assembled not being sufficient to form a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 7.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from Kentucky; Mr. FOSTER, from Rhode Island; Mr. HOWARD, from Maryland; and Mr. LOGAN, from Pennsylvania, severally attended.

There being no quorum, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 8.

The number of members assembled not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 9.

The number of members assembled not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 10.

Mr. S. T. MASON, from Virginia, attended.

The number of members assembled not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 11.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from North Carolina, attended.

The number of members assembled not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, December 13.

Mr. J. MASON, from Massachusetts; Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. OGDEN, from New Jersey; and Mr. SUMTER, from South Carolina, severally attended.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being collected and counted, the whole number was found to be 17, of which 9 make a majority.

Mr. Bradley had 7, Mr. Tracy had 7, Mr. Baldwin 1, Mr. Dayton 1, Mr. Logan 1.

There was consequently no choice. Whereupon, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being collected and counted, the whole number was found to be 17, of which 9 make a majority.

Mr. Bradley had 8, Mr. Tracy 7, Mr. Dayton 1, Mr. Logan 1.

There was consequently no choice. Whereupon, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being counted, the whole number was found to be 17, of which 9 make a majority.

Mr. Bradley had 8, Mr. Tracy 7, Mr. Dayton 1, Mr. Logan 1.

There was consequently no choice. Whereupon, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being counted, the whole number of votes was 14, of which 8 make a majority.

Mr. Tracy had 7, Mr. Bradley 5, Mr. Dayton 1, Mr. Logan 1.

There was consequently no choice; and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 14.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President pro tem pore, as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being collected and counted, the whole number was found to be 17, of which 9 make a majority.

Mr. Bradley had 9, Mr. Tracy 7, Mr. Dayton 1. Consequently, STEPHEN R. BRADLEY was elected President of the Senate pro tempore.

The credentials of Mr. PLUMER, appointed a Senator by the State of New Hampshire, to supply a vacancy occasioned by the resignation of JAMES SHEAFE, Esq., were read; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to him by the President.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and that, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, they have elected STEPHEN R. BRADLEY President of the Senate pro tempore.

A similar notice was directed to be given to the House of Representatives, and also that the Senate are ready to proceed to business.

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers, printed in any of the States, as he may choose; provided that the same be furnished at the rate usual for the annual charge for such papers.

Resolved, That JAMES MATHERS, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one additional assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required of the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly, for the purpose, during the session, and for twenty days after.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House has assembled, and is proceeding on the public business.

On motion, it was Ordered, That Messrs. WRIGHT and T. FOSTER be a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House agree to the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and have appointed a committee on their part.

Mr. WRIGHT reported, from the joint committee last mentioned, that they had accordingly waited on the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses, by Message, to-morrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Resolved, That the Senate do concur in the resolution last mentioned.

On motion, it was agreed to proceed to the choice of a Chaplain on the part of the Senate, and the ballots having been collected and counted, the whole number was 17, of which 9 is the majority.

Doctor Gantt had 10, Mr. M'Cormick 4, Mr. Priestley 2, Mr. Balch 1.

So it was Resolved, That the Rev. Dr. GANTT be the Chaplain to Congress, on the part of the Senate, during the present session.

WEDNESDAY, December 15.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

When we assemble together, fellow-citizens, to consider the state of our beloved country, our just attentions are first drawn to those pleasing circumstances which mark the goodness of that Being from whose favor they flow, and the large measure of thankfulness we owe for his bounty. Another year has come around, and finds us still blessed with peace and friendship abroad; law, order, and religion, at home; good affection and harmony with our Indian neighbors; our burdens lightened, yet our income sufficient for the public wants, and the produce of the year great beyond example. These, fellow-citizens, are the circumstances under which we meet: and we remark, with special satisfaction, those which, under the smiles of Providence, result from the skill, industry, and order, of our citizens, managing their own affairs in their own way, and for their own use, unembarrassed by too much regulation, unoppressed by fiscal exactions.

On the restoration of peace in Europe, that portion of the general carrying trade which had fallen to our share during the war, was abridged by the returning competition of the belligerent Powers. This was to be expected, and was just. But, in addition, we find in some parts of Europe monopolizing discriminations, which, in the form of duties, tend effectually to prohibit the carrying thither our own produce in our own vessels. From existing amities, and a spirit of justice, it is hoped that friendly discussion will produce a fair and adequate reciprocity. But should false calculations of interest defeat our hope, it rests with the Legislature to decide whether they will meet inequalities abroad with countervailing inequalities at home, or provide for the evil in any other way.

It is with satisfaction I lay before you an act of the British Parliament anticipating this subject so far as to authorize a mutual abolition of the duties and countervailing duties, permitted under the treaty of 1794. It shows, on their part, a spirit of justice and friendly accommodation, which it is our duty and our interest to cultivate with all nations. Whether this would produce a due equality in the navigation between the two countries is a subject for your consideration.

Another circumstance which claims attention, as directly affecting the very source of our navigation, is the defect or the evasion of the law providing for the return of seamen, and particularly of those belonging to vessels sold abroad. Numbers of them, discharged in foreign ports, have been thrown on the hands of our Consuls, who, to rescue them from the dangers into which their distresses might plunge them, and save them to their country, have found it necessary, in some cases, to return them at the public charge.

DECEMBER, 1802.

SENATE.

The cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France, which took place in the course of the late war, will, if carried into effect, make a change in the aspect of our foreign relations, which will doubtless have just weight in any deliberations of the Legislature connected with that subject.

There was reason, not long since, to apprehend that the warfare in which we were engaged with Tripoli might be taken up by some other of the Barbary Powers. A reinforcement, therefore, was immediately ordered to the vessels already there. Subsequent information, however, has removed these apprehensions for the present. To secure our commerce in that sea with the smallest force competent, we have supposed it best to watch strictly the harbor of Tripoli. Still, however, the shallowness of their coast, and the want of smaller vessels on our part, has permitted some cruisers to escape unobserved; and to one of these an American vessel unfortunately fell a prey. The captain, one American seaman, and two others of color, remain prisoners with them; unless exchanged under an agreement formerly made with the Bashaw, to whom, on the faith of that, some of his captive subjects had been restored.

The convention with the State of Georgia has been ratified by their Legislature, and a repurchase from the Creeks has been consequently made of a part of the Talassee country. In this purchase has been also comprehended a part of the lands within the fork of Oconee and Oakmulgee rivers. The particulars of the contract will be laid before Congress so soon as they shall be in a state for communication.

In order to remove every ground of difference possible with our Indian neighbors, I have proceeded in the work of settling with them and marking the boundaries between us. That with the Choctaw nation is fixed in one part, and will be through the whole within a short time. The country to which their title had been extinguished before the Revolution is sufficient to receive a very respectable population, which Congress will probably see the expediency of encouraging so soon as the limits shall be declared. We are to view this position as an outpost of the United States, surrounded by strong neighbors, and distant from its support. And how far that monopoly which prevents population should here be guarded against, and actual habitation made a condition of the continuance of title, will be for your consideration. A prompt settlement, too, of all existing rights and claims within this Territory presents itself as a preliminary operation.

In that part of the Indiana Territory which includes Vincennes, the lines settled with the neighboring tribes fix the extinction of their title at a breadth of twenty-four leagues from East to West, and about the same length, parallel with and including the Wabash. They have also ceded a tract of four miles square, including the salt springs, near the mouth of that river.

In the department of finance it is with pleasure I inform you that the receipts of external duties for the last twelve months have exceeded those of any former year, and that the ratio of increase has been also greater than usual. This has enabled us to answer all the regular exigencies of Government, to pay from the Treasury within one year upwards of eight millions of dollars, principal and interest, of the public debt, exclusive of upwards of one million paid by the sale of bank stock, and making in the whole a reduction of nearly five millions and a half of principal, and to have now in the Treasury four millions and a half of dollars, which are in a course of application to the further discharge of debt and current demands. Experience, too, so far, authorizes us to believe, if no extraordinary event supervenes, and the expenses which will be actually incurred shall not be greater than were contemplated by Congress at their last session, that we shall not be disappointed in the expectations then formed. But, nevertheless, as the effect of peace on the amount of duties is not yet fully ascertained, it is the more necessary to practise every useful economy, and to incur no expense which may be avoided without prejudice.

The collection of the internal taxes having been completed in some of the States, the officers employed in it are of course out of commission. In others they will be so shortly; but in a few, where the arrangements for the direct tax had been retarded, it will be some time before the system is closed. It has not yet been thought necessary to employ the agent authorized by an act of the last session, for transacting business in Europe relative to debts and loans. Nor have we used the power, confided by the same act, of prolonging the foreign debt by re-loans, and of redeeming, instead thereof, an equal sum of the domestic debt. Should, however, the difficulties of remittance on so large a scale render it necessary at any time, the power shall be executed, and the money thus employed abroad shall, in conformity with that law, be faithfully applied here in an equivalent extinction of domestic debt. When effects so salutary result from the plans you have already sanctioned; when, merely by avoiding false objects of expense, we are able, without a direct tax, without internal taxes, and without borrowing, to make large and effectual payments towards the discharge of our public debt, and the emancipation of our posterity from that mortal canker; it is an encouragement, fellow-citizens, of the highest order, to proceed as we have begun, in substituting economy for taxation, and in pursuing what is useful for a nation placed as we are, rather than what is practised by others under different circumstances. And whensoever we are destined to meet events which shall call forth all the energies of our countrymen, we have the firmest reliance on those energies, and the comfort of leaving for calls like these the extraordinary resources of loans and internal taxes. In the meantime, by payments of the principal of our debt, we are liberating, annually, portions of the external taxes, and forming from them a growing fund, still further to lessen the necessity of recurring to extraordinary resources.

The usual account of receipts and expenditures for the last year, with an estimate of the expenses of the ensuing one, will be laid before you by the Secretary of the Treasury.

No change being deemed necessary in our Military Establishment, an estimate of its expenses for the ensuing year, on its present footing, as also of the sums to be employed in fortifications, and other objects within that department, has been prepared by the Secretary of War, and will make a part of the general estimates which will be presented to you.

Considering that our regular troops are employed for local purposes, and that the militia is our general reliance for great and sudden emergencies, you will doubtless think this institution worthy of a review, and give it those improvements of which you find it susceptible.

Estimates for the Naval Department, prepared by the Secretary of the Navy, for another year, will, in like manner, be communicated with the general estimates. A small force in the Mediterranean will still be necessary to restrain the Tripoline cruisers; and the uncertain tenure of peace with some other of the Barbary Powers may eventually require that force to be augmented. The necessity of procuring some smaller vessels for that service will raise the estimate; but the difference in their maintenance will soon make it a measure of economy.

Presuming it will be deemed expedient to expend annually a convenient sum towards providing the Naval defence which our situation may require, I cannot but recommend that the first appropriations for that purpose may go to the saving what we already possess. No cares, no attentions, can preserve vessels from rapid decay, which lie in water and exposed to the sun. These decays require great and constant repairs, and will consume, if continued, a great portion of the moneys destined to Naval purposes. To avoid this waste of our resources, it is proposed to add to our navy yard here a dock, within which our present vessels may be laid up dry, and under cover from the sun. Under these circumstances, experience proves that works of wood will remain scarcely at all affected by time. The great abundance of running water which this situation possesses, at heights far above the level of the tide, if employed as is practised for lock navigation, furnishes the means for raising and laying up our vessels on a dry and sheltered bed. And should the measure be found useful here, similar depositories for laying up, as well as for building and repairing vessels, may hereafter be undertaken at other navy yards offering the same means. The plans and estimates of the work, prepared by a person of skill and experience, will be presented to you without delay; and from this it will be seen that scarcely more than has been the cost of one vessel is necessary to save the whole, and that the annual sum to be employed towards its completion may be adapted to the views of the Legislature as to Naval expenditure.

To cultivate peace, and maintain commerce and navigation in all their lawful enterprises; to foster our fisheries as nurseries of navigation and for the nurture of man, and protect the manufactures adapted to our circumstances; to preserve the faith of the nation by an exact discharge of its debts and contracts, expend the public money with the same care and economy we would practise with our own, and impose on our citizens no unnecessary burdens; to keep, in all things, within the pale of our Constitutional powers, and cherish the Federal Union as the only rock of safety; these, fellow-citizens, are the landmarks by which we are to guide ourselves in all our proceedings. By continuing to make these the rule of our action, we shall endeavor to our countrymen the true principles of their Constitution, and promote an union of sentiment and of action, equally auspicious to their happiness and safety. On my part you may count on a cordial concurrence in every measure for the public good; and on all the information I possess which may enable you to discharge to advantage the high functions with which you are invested by your country.

TH. JEFFERSON.

DECEMBER 15, 1802.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read; and Ordered, That five hundred copies of the Message of the President of the United States, together with one hundred copies of each of the papers referred to in the Message, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to a second reading.

WEDNESDAY, January 5.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Hyde," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BALDWIN, CLINTON, and NICHOLAS, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of George White and others, journeymen printers, of the city of Philadelphia, praying that such additional duties may be laid on imported books, as to the wisdom of Congress may seem meet and proper; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. WHITE presented the memorial of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, signed Thomas Fitzsimons, in their behalf, praying that the acts of Congress, entitled "An act imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels," and "An act making further provision for the debts of the United States," as they are attended with the most beneficial consequences to the trade, may not be repealed; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom were recommitted, on the 31st of December last, the bill to carry into effect a resolution of Congress to erect a monument to the memory of the late General David Wooster, together with the amendments thereto, reported further amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year one thousand eight hundred and three;" and a bill entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the Naval service during the year one thousand eight hundred and three;" in which several bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were read, and ordered to the second reading.

On motion, that it be resolved that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio: it was agreed that the motion lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, January 6.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year one thousand eight hundred and three," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. JACKSON, J. MASON, and NICHOLAS, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the Naval service during the year one thousand eight hundred and three," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, PLUMER, and CLINTON, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments yesterday reported, by the committee, to the bill to carry into effect a resolution of Congress to erect a monument to the memory of the late General David Wooster; and having agreed thereto, and amended the bill accordingly, Ordered, That it pass to a third reading as amended.

The motion made yesterday "that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio," was resumed; and, on motion, to strike out after "to," in the first instance, and insert:

"Inquire whether the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio have formed a constitution and State government agreeably to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the ordinance of Congress for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, and make report thereon."

It was agreed that the motion and amendment should lie until to-morrow, and in the mean time be printed for the use of the Senate.

FRIDAY, January 7.

Mr. STONE, from North Carolina, attended.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter signed T. Worthington, agent for the State of Ohio, enclosing a copy of the constitution of the said State, and requesting it might be laid before the Senate; and they were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 5th instant for extending the laws of the United States to the State of Ohio, together with the amendment proposed thereon; which amendment was withdrawn; and it was agreed to adopt the motion, amended as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, Legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Ohio into the Union, or for extending to that State the laws of the United States; and Ordered, That Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, MORRIS, and ANDERSON, be the committee, and that the letter signed T. Worthington, agent for the State of Ohio, laid before the Senate this morning, together with a copy of the constitution of said State, be referred to the same committee, to consider and report thereon.

The bill to carry into effect the several resolutions of Congress for erecting monuments to the memories of the late Generals Wooster, Herkimer, Davidson, and Scriven, was read the third time.

On motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the first Monday in December next, it passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Cocke, Ellery, Nicholas, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Clinton, Dayton, T. Foster, D. Foster, Franklin, Hillhouse, Howard, Jackson, Logan, J. Mason, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Stone, Tracy, Wells, and White.

On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Clinton, Dayton, T. Foster, D. Foster, Franklin, Hillhouse, Howard, Jackson, Logan, J. Mason, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Stone, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Breckenridge, Cocke, Ellery, Nicholas, Sumter, and Wright.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act to carry into effect the several resolutions of Congress for erecting monuments to the memories of the late Generals Wooster, Herkimer, Davidson, and Scriven."

MONDAY, January 10.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 5th instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Hyde," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 6th instant, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three," reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Resolved, That Mr. PLUMER be of the joint committee for enrolled bills on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 6th instant, the bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the Naval service during the year one thousand eight hundred and three," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

TUESDAY, January 11.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you a report received from the Director of the Mint, on the subject of that institution.

JAN. 11, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The Message and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments yesterday reported by the committee to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year one thousand eight hundred and three;" and, having agreed thereto, Ordered, That the bill pass to a third reading as amended.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Hyde," was read the third time, and amended, by adding, line 8th, after the word "services," "in addition to his pay in the line."

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

The bill, entitled "An act making a partial appropriation for the Naval service during the year one thousand eight hundred and three," was read the third time and passed.

In Executive session, the following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France, and perhaps of the Floridas, and the late suspension of our right of deposit at New Orleans, are events of primary interest to the United States. On both occasions, such measures were promptly taken as were thought most likely amicably to remove the present and to prevent future causes of inquietude. The objects of these measures were to obtain the territory on the left bank of the Mississippi, and eastward of that, if practicable, on conditions to which the proper authorities of our country would agree; or, at least, to prevent any changes which might lessen the secure exercise of our rights. While my confidence in our Minister Plenipotentiary at Paris is entire and undiminished, I still think that these objects might be promoted by joining with him a person sent from hence directly, carrying with him the feelings and sentiments of the nation, excited on the late occurrence, impressed by full communications of all the views we entertain on this interesting subject; and thus prepared to meet and to improve, to an useful result, the counter-propositions of the other contracting party, whatsoever form their interests may give to them, and to secure to us the ultimate accomplishment of our object.

I therefore nominate Robert R. Livingston to be Minister Plenipotentiary, and James Monroe to be Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, with full powers to both, jointly, or to either, on the death of the other, to enter into a treaty or convention with the First Consul of France, for the purpose of enlarging, and more effectually securing, our rights and interests in the river Mississippi, and in the territories eastward thereof.

But as the possession of these provinces is still in Spain, and the course of events may retard or prevent the cession to France being carried into effect, to secure our object, it will be expedient to address equal powers to the Government of Spain also, to be used only in the event of its being necessary.

I therefore nominate Charles Pinckney to be Minister Plenipotentiary, and James Monroe, of Virginia, to be Minister Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, with full powers to both, jointly, or to either, on the death of the other, to enter into a treaty or convention with His Catholic Majesty, for the purpose of enlarging, and more effectually securing, our rights and interests in the river Mississippi, and in the territories eastward thereof.

JAN. 11, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

The spoliations and irregularities committed on our commerce during the late war, by subjects of Spain, or by others deemed within her responsibility, having called for attention, instructions were accordingly given to our Minister at Madrid to urge our right to just indemnifications, and to propose a convention for adjusting them. The Spanish Government listened to our proposition with an honorable readiness, and agreed to a convention, which I now submit for your advice and consent. It does not go to the satisfaction of all our claims; but the express reservation of our right to press the validity of the residue has been made the ground of further instructions to our Minister, on the subject of an additional article, which it is to be hoped will not be without effect.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 11, 1803.

The Messages and papers therein referred to were read, and ordered that they severally lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, January 12.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year one thousand eight hundred and three," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

THURSDAY, January 13.

The Senate assembled, but transacted but little or no business of importance.

FRIDAY, January 14.

The Senate went into the consideration of Executive business, and afterwards adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, January 17.

Mr. BROWN, from the State of Kentucky, attended.

After the consideration of Executive business, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, January 18.

TWO Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, the first a confidential Message, which was read, as follows:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

As the continuance of the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes will be under the consideration of the Legislature at its present session, I think it my duty to communicate the views which have guided me in the execution of that act, in order that you may decide on the policy of continuing it, in the present, or any other form, or discontinue it altogether, if that shall, on the whole, seem most for the public good.

The Indian tribes residing within the limits of the United States, have, for a considerable time, been growing more and more uneasy at the constant diminution of the territory they occupy, although effected by their own voluntary sales; and the policy has long been gaining strength with them, of refusing absolutely all further sale, on any conditions; insomuch that, at this time, it hazards their friendship, and excites dangerous jealousies and perturbations in their minds to make any overture for the purchase of the smallest portions of their land. A very few tribes only are not yet obstinately in these dispositions. In order peaceably to counteract this policy of theirs, and to provide an extension of territory, which the rapid increase of our numbers will call for, two measures are deemed expedient. First, to encourage them to abandon hunting, to apply to the raising stock, to agriculture, and domestic manufacture; and thereby prove to themselves that less land and labor will maintain them in this, better than in their former mode of living. The extensive forests necessary in the hunting life, will then become useless; and they will see advantage in exchanging them for the means of improving their farms, and of increasing their domestic comforts. Secondly, to multiply trading houses among them, and place within their reach those things which will contribute more to their domestic comfort, than the possession of extensive, but uncultivated wilds. Experience and reflection will develop to them the wisdom of exchanging what they can spare and we want, for what we can spare, and they want. In leading them thus to agriculture, to manufactures, and civilization; in bringing together their and our settlements, and in preparing them ultimately to participate in the benefits of our Government, I trust and believe we are acting for their greatest good. At these trading-houses we have pursued the principles of the act of Congress, which directs that the commerce shall be carried on liberally, and requires only that the capital stock shall not be diminished. We, consequently, undersell private traders, foreign and domestic, drive them from the competition; and thus, with the good will of the Indians, rid ourselves of a description of men who are constantly endeavoring to excite in the Indian mind suspicions, fears, and irritations, towards us. A letter now enclosed, shows the effect of our competition on the operations of the traders, while the Indians, perceiving the advantage of purchasing from us, are soliciting, generally, our establishment of trading houses among them. In one quarter this is particularly interesting. The Legislature, reflecting on the late occurrences on the Mississippi, must be sensible how desirable it is to possess a respectable breadth of country on that river, from our Southern limit to the Illinois, at least; so that we may present as firm a front on that as on our Eastern border. We possess what is below the Yazoo, and can, probably, acquire a certain breadth from the Illinois and Wabash to the Ohio; but between the Ohio and Yazoo, the country all belongs to the Chickasaws, the most friendly tribe within our limits, but the most decided against the alienation of lands. The portion of our country most important for us, is exactly that which they do not inhabit. Their settlements are not on the Mississippi, but in the interior country. They have lately shown a desire to become agricultural; and this leads to the desire of buying implements and comforts. In the strengthening and gratifying of these wants, I see the only prospect of planting on the Mississippi itself, the means of its own safety. Duty has required me to submit these views to the judgment of the Legislature; but, as their disclosure might embarrass and defeat their effect, they are committed to the special confidence of the two Houses.

While the extension of the public commerce among the Indian tribes may deprive of that source of profit such of our citizens as are engaged in it, it might be worthy the attention of Congress, in their care of individual as well as of the general interest, to point, in another direction, the enterprise of these citizens, as profitably for themselves, and more usefully for the public. The river Missouri, and the Indians inhabiting it, are not as well known as is rendered desirable by their connexion with the Mississippi, and consequently with us. It is, however, understood, that the country on that river is inhabited by numerous tribes, who furnish great supplies of furs and peltry to the trade of another nation, carried on in a high latitude, through an infinite number of portages and lakes, shut up by ice through a long season. The commerce on that line could bear no competition with that of the Missouri, traversing a moderate climate, offering, according to the best accounts, a continued navigation from its source, and possibly with a single portage, from the Western ocean, and finding to the Atlantic a choice of channels through the Illinois, or Wabash, the lakes and Hudson, through the Ohio and Susquehanna, or Potomac or James rivers, and through the Tennessee and Savannah rivers. An intelligent officer, with ten or twelve chosen men, fit for the enterprise, and willing to undertake it, taken from our posts, where they may be spared without inconvenience, might explore the whole line, even to the Western ocean, have conferences with the natives on the subject of commercial intercourse, get admission among them for our traders, as others are admitted, agree on convenient deposits for an interchange of articles, and return with the information acquired, in the course of two summers. Their arms and accoutrements, some instruments of observation, and light and cheap presents for the Indians, would be all the apparatus they could carry, and with an expectation of a soldier's portion of land on their return, would constitute the whole expense. Their pay would be going on, whether here or there. While other civilized nations have encountered great expense to enlarge the boundaries of knowledge, by undertaking voyages of discovery, and for other literary purposes, in various parts and directions, our nation seems to owe to the same object, as well as to its own interests, to explore this, the only line of easy communication across the continent, and so directly traversing our own part of it. The interests of commerce place the principal object within the Constitutional powers and care of Congress, and that it should incidentally advance the geographical knowledge of our continent, cannot but be an additional gratification. The nation claiming the territory, regarding this as a literary pursuit, which it is in the habit of permitting within its dominions, would not be disposed to view it with jealousy, even if the expiring state of its interests there did not render it a matter of indifference. The appropriation of two thousand five hundred dollars, "for the purpose of extending the external commerce of the United States," while understood and considered by the Executive as giving the Legislative sanction, would cover the undertaking from notice, and prevent the obstructions which interested individuals might otherwise previously prepare in its way.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 18, 1803.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The other Message was read, as follows:
*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I enclose a report of the Secretary of War, stating the trading houses established in the Indian territories, the progress which has been made, in the course of the last year, in settling and marking boundaries with the different tribes, the purchases of lands recently made from them, and the prospect of further progress in marking boundaries, in new extinguishments of title in the year to come; for which some appropriations of money will be wanting.

To this I have to add, that, when the Indians ceded to us the salt springs on the Wabash, they expressed a hope that we would so employ them as to enable them to procure there the necessary supplies of salt. Indeed, it would be the most proper and acceptable form in which the annuity could be paid which we propose to give them for the cession. These springs might, at the same time, be rendered eminently serviceable to our western inhabitants, by using them as the means of counteracting the monopolies of salt, and of reducing the price in that country to a just level. For these purposes a small appropriation would be necessary to meet the first expenses, after which they should support themselves, and repay those advances. These springs are said to possess the advantage of being accompanied with a bed of coal.

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

AARON BURR, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate, attended.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee on the petition of Sarah Fletcher and Jane Ingraham.

Ordered, That the report be committed to the original committee, with an instruction further to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the seventh instant, the motion to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, Legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Ohio into the Union, or for extending to that State the laws of the United States, made report; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate
and of the House of Representatives:*

I now lay before Congress the annual account of the fund established for defraying the contingent charges of Government. A single article of one thousand four hundred and forty dollars, paid for bringing home seventy-two seamen, discharged in foreign ports from vessels sold abroad, is the only expenditure from that fund: leaving an unexpended balance of eighteen thousand five hundred and sixty dollars in the Treasury.

The Message and paper therein referred to were read.

Ordered, That they be committed to Messrs. MORRIS, J. MASON, and DAYTON, to consider and report thereon.

THURSDAY, January 20.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a certificate of the election of SAMUEL M'CCLAY, Esq., of Northumberland county, and State of Pennsylvania, to be a Senator of the United States from the fourth day of March next, inclusive; and it was read and ordered to lie on file.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter signed John Avery, Secretary of the State of Massachusetts, with a set of the maps of that State, for the use of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Messonnier;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were read, and ordered to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the confidential Message of the President of the United States, communicated on the eighteenth instant, and Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. NICHOLAS, JACKSON, and LOGAN, to consider and report thereon.

FRIDAY, January 21.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Messonnier," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, CLINTON, and ELLERY, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. PLUMER, OLCOTT, and DWIGHT FOSTER, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors in the District of Columbia," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, WELLS, and STONE, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee of the 19th instant, on the motion to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, Legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Ohio into the Union, or for extending to that State the laws of the United States; and Ordered, That it be referred to a special committee, with an instruction to bring in a bill accordingly; and that Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, MORRIS, and ANDERSON, be the committee.

MONDAY, January 24.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the State of Delaware, enclosing the credentials of SAMUEL WHITE, Esq., elected a Senator of the United States for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March next; and they were read.

Ordered, That they lie on file.

Mr. J. MASON, from the committee to whom the report on their petition was recommended the 19th instant, reported a bill for the relief of Sarah Fletcher and Jane Ingraham; which was read.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the second reading.

Mr. MORRIS laid before the Senate the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, praying that a repeal of the acts making discrimination between American and foreign duties on imports and tonnage may not take place, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an assurance company in the city of Washington;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Hugh Alexander and others;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They agree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills first named in the message were read, and ordered to a second reading.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment of the House of Representatives to their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States in the year one thousand eight hundred and three;" and Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I transmit a report by the Superintendent of the City of Washington, on the affairs of the city committed to his care. By this you will perceive that the resales of lots prescribed by an act of the last session of Congress did not produce a sufficiency to pay the debt to Maryland to which they are appropriated; and as it was evident that the sums necessary for the interest and instalments due to that State could not be produced by a sale of the other public lots, without an unwarrantable sacrifice of the property, the deficiencies were of necessity drawn from the Treasury of the United States.

The office of the Surveyor of the city, created during the former establishment, being of indispensable necessity, it has been continued: and to that of the Superintendent, substituted instead of the Board of Commissioners at the last session of Congress, no salary was annexed by law. These offices being permanent, I have supposed it more agreeable to principle that their salaries should be fixed by the Legislature, and therefore have assigned them none. Their services to be compensated are from the first day of June last.

The Marshal of the District of Columbia has, as directed by law, caused a jail to be built in the City of Washington. I enclose his statements of the expenses already incurred, and of what remains to be finished. The portion actually completed has rendered the situation of the persons confined much more comfortable and secure than it has been heretofore.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States of the 18th instant, as relates to the salt springs on the Wabash, be referred to a special committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise, and that Messrs. FRANKLIN, BRECKENRIDGE, and ANDERSON, be the committee.

On motion, that it be

Resolved, That so much of the letter of the Secretary of War which accompanied the Message of the President of the United States of the 18th instant, as relates to the renewal of the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," be referred to a special committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise:

It was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, January 26.

JAMES ROSS, from Pennsylvania, attended.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Postmaster General, in conformity with the thirtieth section of the act to establish the Post Office; which was read.

Ordered, That it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion made yesterday that the report of the Secretary for the Department of State, made in 1793, on the privileges and restrictions of commerce, be printed, was resumed; and the blank filled with the words "two hundred;" and the motion was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That two hundred copies of a report made by the Secretary of State in 1793, to both Houses of Congress, respecting the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill for the relief of Sarah Fletcher and Jane Ingraham; and, on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

THURSDAY, January 27.

Mr. ROSS presented the several representations and memorials of Richard Basset, Egbert Benson, Benjamin Bourne, William Griffith, Samuel Hitchcock, B. P. Key, C. Magill, Jeremiah Smith, G. K. Taylor, William Tilghman, and Oliver Wolcott, judges of the circuit courts under the late act, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States;" stating that, since the repeal of the said act, no law had been made for assigning to them the execution of any Judicial functions, nor has any provision been made for the payment of their stipulated compensations; and most respectfully requesting Congress to review the existing laws with respect to the officers in question; and the memorials were read.

Ordered, That they be referred to Messrs. MORRIS, ROSS, and DAYTON, to consider and report thereon, and that the memorials be printed for the use of the Senate. The memorial is as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned most respectfully submit the following resolution and memorial.

By an act of Congress passed on the thirteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," certain judicial offices were created, and courts established, called circuit courts of the United States.

In virtue of appointments made under the Constitution of the United States, the undersigned became vested with the offices so created, and received commissions authorizing them to hold the same, with the emoluments thereunto appertaining, during their good behaviour.

During the last session an act of Congress passed, by which the above mentioned law was declared to be repealed; since which no law has been made for assigning to your memorialists the execution of any judicial functions, nor has any provision been made for the payment of their stipulated compensations.

Under these circumstances, and finding it expressly declared in the Constitution of the United States, that "The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office," the undersigned, after the most deliberate consideration, are compelled to represent it as their opinion, that the rights secured to them by the Constitution, as members of the Judicial department, have been impaired.

With this sincere conviction, and influenced by a sense of public duty, they most respectfully request of Congress to review the existing laws which respect the offices in question, and to define the duties to be performed by the undersigned, by such provisions as shall be consistent with the Constitution, and the convenient administration of justice.

The right of the undersigned to their compensations, they sincerely believe to be secured by the Constitution, notwithstanding any modification of the Judicial department, which, in the opinion of Congress, public convenience may recommend. This right, however, involving a personal interest, will be cheerfully submitted to judicial examination and decision, in such manner as the wisdom and impartiality of Congress may prescribe.

That judges should not be deprived of their offices or compensations without misbehaviour appears to the undersigned, to be among the first and best established principles in the American constitutions; and in the various reforms they have undergone, it has been preserved and guarded with increased solicitude.

On this basis the Constitution of the United States has laid the foundation of the Judicial department, and expressed its meaning in terms equally plain and permanent.

This being the deliberate and solemn opinion of the undersigned, the duty of their stations requires that they should declare it to the Legislative body. They regret the necessity which compels them to make the representation, and they confide that it will be attributed to a conviction that they ought not voluntarily to surrender rights and authorities entrusted to their protection, not for their personal advantage, but for the benefit of the community.

MR. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 20th instant, the Message of the President of the United States, of the 18th, reported, in part, that an act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," ought to be revived and continued in force; and the report was agreed to; and Ordered, That it be recommended to the same committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

MR. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st instant, the report of the committee on the motion to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, Legislative measures may be necessary for admitting the State of Ohio into the Union, or for extending to that State the laws of the United States, reported a bill on the subject; which was read, and ordered to the second reading.

FRIDAY, January 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Attorney General of the United States, on the contract with John Cleves Symmes, in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 30th April last; which was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration, and that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

MR. HOWARD presented the petition of William Marbury, Robert Townsend Hooe, and Dennis Ramsay, praying that the Secretary of the Senate may be directed to deliver them a certified copy of their nominations to be justices of the peace for the counties of Washington and Alexandria; and the petition was read, as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate of the United States of America, the petition of William Marbury, Robert Townsend Hooe, and Dennis Ramsay, most respectfully sheweth:

That your petitioners have been informed and verily believe that John Adams, while President of the United States, nominated to the Senate of the United States, for their advice and consent, your petitioner William Marbury, to be a justice of the peace in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and your petitioners Robert Townsend Hooe, and Dennis Ramsay, to be justices of the peace in the county of Alexandria, in the same District; that the said nominations were duly taken into consideration by the Senate, who, on or about the first day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, were pleased to give their advice and consent that your petitioners should be severally appointed to the offices aforesaid; that commissions were accordingly in due form signed by the said President, and directed to be sent to your petitioners by the Secretary of State, but that your petitioners, from some cause have been deprived of their commissions, and are reduced to the necessity of asserting their rights to the same in a judicial course of proceeding, in which, as they are advised, it will be requisite to produce satisfactory evidence of the advice and consent of the Senate to the appointment of your petitioners to be justices of the peace as aforesaid in the District of Columbia. Application has been made to the Secretary of the Senate for his certificate that the advice and consent of the Senate was given in consequence of the nominations aforesaid, that your petitioners should be appointed to be justices of the peace in the District of Columbia aforesaid, which your Secretary has declined giving without the leave of the Senate. Your petitioners pray the premises may be taken into consideration, and that your Secretary may be permitted to give to your petitioners a certificate in usual form, setting forth that your petitioners having been nominated by the President of the United States to the aforesaid offices severally and respectively of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, the Senate advised and consented to their appointment. And as in duty bound, &c.

Whereupon, a motion was made, that it be

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to give an attested copy of the proceedings of the Senate of the 2d and 3d of March, 1801, so far as they relate to the nomination and appointment of William Marbury, Robert Townsend Hooe, and Dennis Ramsay, as justices of the peace for the counties of Washington and Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, on the application of them or either of them.

And it was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

Mr. ROSS presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, signed Thomas Fitzsimons, President, stating that damages had been sustained by the merchants of that city, from a too rigid construction, by the officers of the revenue, of the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," and praying the interposition of Congress for their relief; and the memorial was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

Mr. PLUMER, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth," reported amendments; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

The bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio was read the second time.

The motion, made on the 25th instant, for the appointment of a committee on so much of the letter of the Secretary of War, which accompanied the Message of the President of the United States of the 18th instant, as relates to the establishment of trading-houses with the Indians, was withdrawn.

Mr. MORRIS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 27th inst., the several memorials of the judges, under the late act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, made report; which was read, and it was agreed that this report be the order of the day for Wednesday next.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth."

Ordered, That this bill be recommitted to the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio; and, on motion, that the bill be amended, it was agreed that the further consideration of the bill, together with the proposed amendment, should be the order of the day for Thursday, the 3d of February next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Ray and John Follawell;" a bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States;'" and a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the sale of a piece of land, parcel of the navy-yard, belonging to the United States, in Charlestown, in the State of Massachusetts, to the proprietors of the Salem turnpike road and Chelsea bridge corporation," in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

WILLIAM MARBURY AND OTHERS.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 28th instant:

"That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to give an attested copy of the proceedings of the Senate of the 2d and 3d of March, 1801, so far as they relate to the nomination and appointment of William Marbury, Robert T. Hooe, and Dennis Ramsay, as justices of the peace for the counties of Washington and Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, on the application of them or either of them."

Mr. HOWARD said he should not trouble the Senate with any observations upon the question; the request was so reasonable, that he concluded it would pass without objection.

Mr. JACKSON wished to have some explanation of this business. It must, he said, be recollected that an attempt was made at the last session to effect the same thing, with this only difference, that the application was then made by counsel, which now came from the men themselves. The motion on that occasion was introduced by a member from Massachusetts, who, after hearing the objections offered against it, thought proper to withdraw it. He considered it now, as he then did, an attack upon the Executive Department of Government, and as such should be prepared to oppose it, as often, and in whatever shape it might present itself.

Mr. MASON observed it was true, as the honorable gentleman from Georgia had stated, a motion similar to the present resolution, he had himself made at the last session, and for the same purpose. It was in consequence of a verbal application at the door of the Senate Chamber, from one of the parties, or their counsel, to whom he was a stranger. He gave to them his opinion at the time, that the application was proper and would be granted as a thing of course. He was afterwards surprised to hear objections offered—the principal ones however, were, that the record was a secret record, and that, by a standing rule, no copy was allowed but by special order. It was time now to consider the propriety of granting it, when the parties themselves applied in writing, stating the purposes for which they wanted it, and upon this ground the motion was either withdrawn or rejected. In the present case they had applied in a respectful manner, in form of memorial, and had stated the reasons of their application, and the use they wished to make of the copy, to establish an existing right. They were citizens and parties to the Government and to its privileges. The principles upon which this Government was founded were freedom and equality of rights, and a protection to these rights. The petitioners now claim that protection, by a request that we would grant to them our knowledge of the existence of a fact necessary to establish one of their rights. Publicity of record was a Constitutional provision, and a check in favor of the people. It was a right belonging to the meanest citizen to inspect the records of the Government, unless the divulging of these records would be inconsistent with the public safety and interest. And when that was not the case it was our duty to grant the request—they had a right to demand it. It was upon the same ground that every citizen had a right to demand and compel the testimony of his fellow-citizens, upon peril of damages equal to the loss of his testimony; it is an implied promise, founded upon mutual protection and aid to each other in the support of their individual rights. It is one of the great reasons for which men associate. The same justice is due from public bodies, though compulsory process is not in both cases to be had.

This request is so accordant with a common sense of justice, that he had no doubt the mere exemplification of a record, or a certified copy, in itself not improper to be made public, would be granted by one enemy to another, in an enemy's country. Mr. M. was at a loss to know what possible injury could arise by giving a copy of a fact so notorious, and he hoped therefore the parties would be indulged.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE thought it improper to grant the prayer of the petitioners. The Executive Journal is kept only for the private use of the Senate and there is an express rule that extracts should not be given without the order of the House. He knew of no instance in which they could with propriety be claimed or given, but if there were any such, he begged gentlemen to point them out. As to the case in question, to grant the prayer of the petition would, he said, administer to the means of assailing the Executive Department of the Government. He considered the President as in some measure a party to the Executive Journal, and therefore an extract of it ought not to be communicated without his consent. The Senate ought to protect the dignity of that branch in which they participate. The suit is now pending on a mandamus to the Secretary of State. The Senate ought not to aid the Judiciary in their invasion of the rights of the Executive. There could be no use in giving such extracts, and there might be mischief.

Mr. MORRIS was much in opinion with Mr. B. He thought that the rule respecting the Executive Journal was wise, and that extracts ought not to be given for trivial purposes: that it might be a means of embarrassing the Government, and lessening the respect due to those who administer it. That he had no apprehension of any such on the part of the Judiciary; he was persuaded they would treat with due respect the other parts of the Government. But such attempts might be made by others, and therefore it was not prudent to furnish the means, or to establish a rule of which designing men might avail themselves for bad purposes. For these reasons he was inclined to reject the proposed resolution. On the other hand he considered the application of a suitor for evidence to support his right, as of a very serious nature. A denial of that evidence might amount to a denial of justice. He was not prepared to go so far. If in possession of a deed making a link in the chain of a suitor's title, the courts might compel him to appear, and bring with him the deed; he did not feel himself justified in using the authority with which, as a Senator, he was invested, for the purpose of refusing that which another could rightfully demand, and oblige him by law, as a private citizen, to give. That in the present case, the merits of which were unknown to him, it was possible, as has been suggested, that other evidence might be produced, and though of inferior force, be validated by the refusal of the Senate. Perhaps, too, the court might issue process, compelling the Secretary to appear and bring with him the Journal. It was equally possible that they might not think it proper to issue such process, or that the Secretary might refuse to answer, alleging his duty to keep the secrets of the Senate. That if from these or any other causes, the Court should declare they could not do right because the Senate withheld the evidence, he should feel himself guilty of a denial of justice. That in effect the assent of the Senate being a pre-requisite to the appointment of an officer, it might be necessary to show that assent when his authority should be legally questioned. If the Senate refuse on the present occasion, where the evidence is said to be necessary to obtain the office, how could they grant it on another occasion where it would be necessary to preserve the office? On the whole, Mr. MORRIS declared he should reluctantly give his vote in favor of the resolution, because the greater weight of reason was in favor of it, and because he could not answer to the world, or to his own conscience, the delay or denial of justice.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was opposed to the resolution; he could not discover that the applicants had any right to the extract prayed for. The Senate had by a specific rule declared the Executive records a secret. But he could not conceive what benefit they (the petitioners) could derive from an extract if they obtained it. They ask that the Secretary of the Senate may be allowed to certify facts from the Executive record; but the Supreme Court, nor no court, would admit such a certificate as testimony, because the Secretary had no seal. In order to get any benefit from this record, the court should allow the petitioners a subpoena to the Secretary of the Senate, with a duces tecum. He challenged all lawyers upon this subject, and all men of common sense; they must all agree with him that the thing prayed for could do the petitioners no good without a seal. But, Mr. W. said, he had further objections against passing the resolution. It was well known why this certificate was requested. It was to aid in an audacious attempt to pry into Executive secrets, by a tribunal which had no authority to do any such thing; and to enable the Supreme Court to assume an unheard of and unbounded power, if not despotism. It was to enable the Judiciary to exercise an authority over the President, which he could never consent to. It was well known that the persons applying were enemies to the President, and that the court were not friendly to him, and, under these circumstances, to interfere in the business would be making the Senate a party. No court on earth could control the Legislature, and yet it had been held here on this floor that they could, and this was a part of the same attempt to set the court above the President, and to cast a stigma upon him. The President had a right to withhold the commissions from these justices, because they did not hold their offices de bene merito, but de bene placito.

Mr. HILLHOUSE remarked that he did not discern anything in the resolution under consideration that had the smallest relation to the character and conduct of the President, nor was there anything in the application that could lead to such a conclusion. It is said there is a cause pending before the Supreme Court of the United States, in which it is important to ascertain the fact, that the Senate did advise and consent to the appointment of the individuals named in this application to be justices of the peace for this territory, and a copy of the journals of the Senate is requested for that purpose—the journals of the Senate being the only evidence of the fact, can that evidence with propriety be withheld? The opinion that such copy would not be admitted as evidence cannot be correct, for it is the only mode in which many important facts in relation to appointments to office, and the ratification of treaties, can be proved. For what purpose are the journals (which are the only record of the proceedings of the Senate) kept, if they are not to be resorted to as evidence of what is done in Senate?

Suppose a question to arise in a court of justice relative to the office of the marshal or judge, and it should be claimed that there had never been a Constitutional appointment to such office; for that the nomination had been rejected by the Senate, and their advice and consent had never been obtained—or in case of a treaty with a foreign nation the President should by proclamation declare the ratification, and promulge the same as the supreme law of the land, where the Senate had refused their advice and consent to such ratification—in neither case would the act of the President be valid without the previous advice and consent of the Senate, and how can it be proved that such advice and consent has been had but by a resort to the journals of the Senate? Surely the commission or proclamation of the President could not be conclusive, because the Senate are an independent body, on whom the Constitution has devolved certain Executive duties, of which the President can have no personal knowledge; the performance of which duties are by the Constitution made indispensable to the validity of certain acts of the President. In all these cases the President may be deceived; the Secretary of the Senate may by mistake or fraud certify that the advice and consent of the Senate has been had to an appointment to office, or the ratification of a treaty, when the fact is otherwise; and where, but to the journals of the Senate, can we resort to correct the error? It is a possible case that a President may assume the right, in opposition to the opinion of the Senate, to make appointments to office and ratify treaties, and shall it be said his commission or proclamation is to be admitted as conclusive evidence, which cannot be questioned, and in that way evade the Constitution? This would be giving to the President high prerogatives indeed; it would be investing him with the absolute power of appointment; and declaring that his proclamation shall be the supreme law of the land. The commission of the President is undoubtedly high evidence of the appointment to office and the proclamation of the ratification of a treaty, but cannot be conclusive, because the Constitution has made the advice and consent of the Senate a prerequisite, and indispensable to the validity of the appointment or ratification, and nothing can come in place of it. A rejection of this resolution will be a denial of right to an individual, and, under any Government, would be considered as an arbitrary, tyrannical act. Under these impressions, he should give his vote in favor of the resolution.

Mr. OGDEN observed, that there was no rule in society better established, than the one which denies to an individual the right of withholding his testimony, when required to give it, in a court of law, upon the prosecution of a legal suit. That this rule had no exceptions, if the honor or interest of the witness would not be compromised thereby.

That the present was a decent application to the Senate, for the evidence of a fact, in their power to give, and upon which a suit at law had been predicated. That the petitioners, by applying for a copy of the Executive Journal, had pursued the only possible mode of obtaining this evidence. That parol evidence of the contents of this record could not be admitted, neither could a subpoena cause it to travel out of the office to which it belongs.

That although Executive business is done with closed doors, yet there is no rule that the Journal in question should be kept secret; that it was open to inspection, and that there was nothing to prevent the Secretary from giving the copy, but the rule of the Senate, which requires that leave should be first obtained. That no reason had been given, which was satisfactory to his mind, why this leave should not be granted. That he would not delay the Senate, by answering such arguments, as had been adduced to prove that the evidence would not be admitted, and that, if admitted, would not support the suit; because the court, before whom the evidence might come, and not the witness, is alone competent to decide such points.

That it was not true, as had been stated, that no case would arise, where such copies as are now required, ought to be allowed; such cases had been put, and the most important rights of the citizen depend upon such testimony. That, upon a quo warranto, whereby the right to officiate as a judge, although acting under a commission, might be called in question, such testimony would be allowed to go forth, if it would prove that this Senate had never advised or consented to the appointment of such judge.

That a citizen might, in a court of law, deny the proclamation of a treaty to be the supreme law of the land, and prove its nullity by such testimony, if it would show that such treaty had been negatived by more than one-third of the Senate then present. That, if such copies might be allowed for evidence in any case whatever, it followed, that it would be proper to allow it in the present case. That no distinction existed between the present case and the one which had been admitted during the discussion, when it was said, that the House of Representatives, when parties to an impeachment, had a right to demand from the Senate, before whom the cause must be tried, the testimony of this Executive Journal. That in such case the Senate would sit as a court, and such testimony could not be obtained under the rule of the Senate, unless leave should be given by the Senate in their Executive capacity; and that all parties, whose rights were interested, whether individual citizens or House of Representatives, stood upon an equal floor, when in a court of justice.

That no danger, as had been apprehended, could arise in regard to the dignity of the President, or the honor of the Government. That our judges were an independent branch, and no possible presumption could be admitted, that they would do wrong, or transcend their jurisdiction; and that he should therefore, with great clearness, vote for the resolution on the table.

Mr. JACKSON said, the Executive Journal ought not to be given to any applicants, much less to these. He considered the whole as an attempt to injure the Executive. The applicants had a process before the Supreme Court, and let them get along with it as well as they could; if they could obtain a decision of court in their favor, let them make the most of it; he hoped the Senate would not interfere in it, and become a party to an accusation which might end in an impeachment, of which the Senate were the Constitutional judges. One case, he would agree, might occur, when the Senate must give up their Executive records, and everything else, if required by the House of Representatives, as evidence to support an impeachment; their call would be omnipotent, in his opinion. But he thought the commission of the President was the only evidence of an appointment, and in all cases conclusive. And he would never lend his aid to set the Judiciary above the Executive. Let the applicants inform the House of Representatives, if any officer of the Government had injured them, and procure an impeachment, if they could; this would be the proper remedy.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE said, he had not supposed the question would have been so strongly contended. He thought sufficient reasons had been stated in the beginning, for rejecting the resolution. But arguments had been brought in support of it, which required some notice. It had been stated that extracts from the Executive Journal might be necessary to prove the right of an officer to his office. This was unfounded. The commission granted by the President was full and complete evidence of the authority granted to the officer. That it must always be presumed the commission had been granted in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. This was a confidence reposed in the President by the theory of our Constitution. That it must be presumed the President will do right. That a commission from him constitutes an officer, not only de facto, but de jure: and is in its nature so conclusive, that no court could inquire into the validity of it. That the contrary insinuation is derogatory to his dignity, which the Senate are bound to protect. That the Senate should not countenance the Judiciary in their attack on the Executive power, which is not constitutionally amenable to the judges. That the case which had been relied on as to treaties, was, in its nature similar. The full evidence was contained in the President's proclamation. It was to be presumed that he had not ratified a treaty without the consent of the Senate, and therefore full faith was to be given to his proclamation. That it was dangerous to countenance the pretensions set up by the judges to examine into the conduct of other branches of the Government; for that, if they had a right to examine, they must have, as a necessary incident, the right to control the other departments of Government. That such right was inconsistent with every idea of good government, and must necessarily degrade those branches which the Judiciary should thus undertake to direct. The present suit was therefore levelled at the dignity of the first Executive Magistrate, and as he thought the Senate bound to protect that dignity, he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. TRACY said he was not sorry for this discussion, and as there had never, to his knowledge, been a similar application, the decision on this would form an important precedent; he therefore thought it best that the subject should be examined in all its bearings. The first inquiry that occurred to his mind was, could there be a case which would render it proper to direct the Secretary to give an extract from the Executive records?

Petition of William Marbury and Others.

SENATE.

A case might be stated which had in fact happened; a gentleman who had been duly appointed a district judge, received, by mistake, a commission as circuit judge; there was a circuit judge already appointed, commissioned, and acting in that capacity, so that two commissions, exactly similar in point of form and substance, to two different men, were existing at the same time, authorizing both to act in a capacity where the law allowed but one to act. What can be done? Shall we resort to the President to rectify the mistake? He is out of office, or it may be he is dead; shall we resort to the Secretary of State? He is out of office, or dead. Besides, if both were living and disposed to rectify the mistake, they could neither of them compel obedience. Shall we resort to the Senate? A mandate from them would tend only to show their imbecility, as their Executive functions extend not to commissions, but solely to advice and consent on a nomination. An application then to a court of justice by quo warranto, or some other process, was the only proper efficient remedy to prevent the conflicting operations of the two judges. Could any gentleman point out another remedy?

What course would a court pursue in such an inquiry? Upon inspection of the commissions both are equally authentic. A resort must be had to the Executive Journal of the Senate; and there, it would appear, that one judge was nominated as a district judge, and as such only the appointment received the advice and consent of the Senate, and that his commission had issued, by mistake, as circuit judge instead of district judge. A judgment of court, that such a commission was void, would be an effectual remedy. But was not an extract of the Executive records of the Senate the best evidence which the nature of the case admitted? The records of the Executive, or Secretary of State, if any such were kept, would amount to no more than that the Secretary of the Senate made a report of certain transactions of the Senate; in which report, if the Secretary should mistake the fact, either by accident or corruption, the evil must remain without a remedy.

The highest evidence which could in such a case exist, he thought was to be derived from an extract of the record kept by the Senate, and under a solemn order officially given and attested by their Secretary. All other evidence which he could conceive of was of a subordinate kind. But in objection, it had been stated that the Executive Journal was a secret, to which the President is a party, and without his consent no extract should be given. Mr. T. said that however this observation might be just, in respect to confidential Messages, yet the Executive Journal was as completely under the control of the Senate, and of them only, as it would be if no President existed; as a House, and a substantive branch of Government, they had a Constitutional authority to keep Journals, and to make rules regulating their conduct in that and all other official transactions; and acting in that capacity, they had made a rule that no extracts should be taken from the Executive Journal without an order of Senate; plainly indicating, that if they please to give such order, neither the President nor any body else had a right to object. If the Senate chose, they might act upon all nominations of the President with open doors; but merely for their own convenience they had acted hitherto in a different manner; but no member had ever thought he violated any injunction of secrecy by informing that a nomination was made, and every circumstance attending it, after the Senate had acted upon it, nor even when it lay before them, undetermined.

He thought it was clearly proved that there was a possible case when an extract might be given. The next consideration would be, ought it to be given in this case?

The applicants say, that they are attempting to obtain before a court of justice remedy for a wrong done by the Secretary of State in withholding from them certain commissions as justices of peace, to which they claim a right. They say an extract from the Executive Journals, that the Senate advised and consented to their appointment is, as they are advised, indispensable in their cause. Now what answer can be given to this? Is it not a dictate of common sense that they should have it? Have they not a right to it, upon the plain principles of our social compact, unless some injury will arise by granting it? The grant can injure no person, and a refusal may injure the applicants. But it was said, by furnishing this extract, the President would be put in jeopardy. He could not possibly discover the reason of all the ferment and sensibility about the President. Was he in danger, or could he be in danger from it? If an improper attack was made upon the President, he would agree that so far from assisting in it the Senate should rally in his defence.

Let us see, said he, what the facts are. The request is for an extract from the Executive Journal of the Senate, as testimony in a court of justice, and claimed to be absolutely necessary to establish the rights of individuals. He knew nothing of the cause, except what he derived from the petition, and the declarations of gentlemen in debate, by which he learnt that a mandamus was prayed for against the Secretary of State for withholding certain commissions which had been completed by the President, and left with the Secretary for delivery. The court was authorized by statute of the Federal Legislature, among other things, to issue writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding offices under the authority of the United States.

A plain simple proceeding, before a court competent to hear and decide. What reasonable cause of alarm could this be to the friends of the President? He could see none. And the gratuitous observations of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) that the court were unfriendly to the President, and that the applicants had done this to injure him, were, in his opinion, out of order, improper, and totally irrelevant. But it was said that this extract could do no good to those who request it; because it did not make out their case. Gentlemen, he thought, affected to know more about the case of these applicants than was requisite, for a just decision of the petitioner. What was it to the Senate, if the testimony is not complete? Suffice it to say, it is a part and a necessary part of their testimony. Suppose, said he, for the sake of argument, that the Secretary of State has been bribed to reserve these commissions; or, suppose the President had committed them to me to carry them to the petitioners, and I had destroyed them corruptly, and a claim was made before a court of justice for a remedy against the wrong so done? Could damages be obtained unless the plaintiff could show that every prerequisite was complied with to make these commissions valuable; and, among the rest, that the Senate had advised and consented to the appointments? Or, put the question the other way, could not I defend successfully against an action if I could show that no such advice and consent was had, and that therefore the commissions were of no value? He thought it clear that the testimony would be important, though perhaps not all which the case would require. But another, and, if possible, a more extraordinary objection had been made; that an impeachment was all the remedy which was applicable to the case stated. Let them obtain from the other House an impeachment, say the gentlemen, if they can, and then we will try it.

SENATE.

Petition of William Marbury and Others.

I am bound, said Mr. T., to believe this is the serious opinion of the luminaries of our nation, because it is solemnly declared in debate, otherwise he should have said that such an observation could not be serious. What will be the effect of a conviction on an impeachment? A removal from office and a disqualification from holding office. And is it not the express declaration of the Constitution, that the party thus convicted shall be liable to indictment, trial, and punishment, for the same offence; and is he not still liable to an action for private damages, in case any have been suffered, by an individual?

There could be no doubt but, in this very case, damages would be recoverable, if the commissions were withheld by the Secretary of State from any corrupt or sinister motives. It was likewise said that the commission was prima facie evidence of the holder's right to office; and not only so, but conclusive; and as the parties complaining had not commissions, they could have no conclusive evidence of their right. This, he said, was equally extraordinary with many other assertions. It seemed to be a position laid down by the gentlemen that this petition should be opposed, and any objection on earth was pertinent and sufficient. If, on a view of this subject, there was not at least a colorable right in the applicants, he was exceedingly mistaken. A right to what? to office? Yes, and a right to their commissions, which, they say, are withheld, as a proof of their right to office.

He would observe one word, upon the conclusive operation of a Presidential commission, and a proclamation promulgating a treaty. The gentlemen say both are conclusive, and cannot be invalidated by any possible testimony. If so, he thought the Senate should go home, being useless at the seat of Government, for it would be only requisite for a President to issue a proclamation in case of treaty, and a commission in case of office, and the advice and consent of the Senate was always to be presumed; and the contrary could not possibly be shown. This was saying, most emphatically, that our President could do no wrong.

He was clear in the position that, in the case stated, the petitioners would stand in need of the extract requested, and that they had a right to it; that granting it would do no harm, and withholding it would be an arbitrary denial of justice. He therefore should vote for the resolution.

Mr. BALDWIN had not been in the House when the debate commenced. He thought, as it related to Executive business, it ought to have been conducted as such business usually is; that, as the question then stood, he should be against the resolution. He considered it as relating to a part of our Constitution, which the sages who framed, and certainly those who adopted, it, had always considered as peculiarly delicate. That it was one of those nice theories which, in varying from established practice, ought to be carried into effect with great discretion; that he had ever thought the unity of Executive power essential to the energy of action which ought to prevail. Everything therefore which tended to divide that oneness, so desirable, ought to be avoided. That it was true the assent of the Senate was required by the Constitution before an appointment of officers could take place; that, on the nomination of the President the business was inchoate; and although while it was in transitu the Senate kept a journal for their own satisfaction, yet he thought such (their private journal) ought not to be made public—more especially as it would destroy that desirable oneness so useful in all things which concern the Executive power; that he was, however, unwilling to establish a precedent of any sort. He thought no general rule should be made, either to grant or to withhold extracts from that journal. Every application should, he thought, be considered and decided under its particular circumstances. That the present case was an application for a mandamus to the Secretary of State, by persons conceiving or stating themselves to be justices of the peace; that, even if they could obtain the extract they ask for, it would not answer their purpose; for, although the Senate approved of an officer when nominated by the President, it did not follow that the President would make the appointment—circumstances might arise to alter his opinion. The applicant therefore for a mandamus must be defeated, if he could not produce the President's commission, and if he could, that was a sufficient evidence of his right, without the extract asked for. Mr. B. was therefore of opinion that the petitioners had asked for a thing which was useless; and he was convinced that the Senate, exercising a sound discretion, would not grant a thing which must be useless, and which might, perhaps, be productive of evil consequences.

Mr. MORRIS.—Mr. President, when I first rose,

JANUARY, 1803.

Petition of William Marbury and Others.

in this debate, I felt and expressed much doubt; but the better reason appearing in favor of the resolution, had determined me to vote for it. At present, my opinion is clear and decided. The conviction has been produced by the arguments of those who opposed the resolution. These contain the most monstrous system of tyranny that ever, I believe, was brought before a national assembly. Permit me to notice a few of the strange positions which we have just heard.

It has been said by a gentleman from Georgia, on my right, (Mr. JACKSON,) that an extract from our Executive Journal should not be given to a suitor in one of our courts, because it may contain matter to support an impeachment against the President, which impeachment is to be tried before us; and therefore we, being judges, should not also become parties by furnishing evidence. And yet the same gentleman has told us that, upon the demand of the other House, (who, according to him, have a right to demand everything,) we are bound to furnish this very evidence, if they require it, for the purpose of bringing or maintaining an impeachment. Thus we must withhold from a fellow-citizen the evidence needed to support his right, because it may furnish ground for impeachment, although no ground for impeachment exist. This, too, it seems, is required by the impartiality which we should preserve as judges, before whom such possible impeachment may be tried. But when there is a question of impeachment, and when we are in effect the judges, then, on the demand of the other House, we are bound to furnish that evidence which we are now bound to withhold.

We have been told that the Executive officers are all dependent on the Chief, and act under his direction; that, therefore, his dignity is implicated in their acts; and, consequently, the conduct of these agents must not be questioned, lest his dignity be impaired. What broader shield can be interposed to shelter the agents of Executive authority? How can they be more completely guarded against all just investigation?

We are further told that a condemnation of these agents must affect the dignity of our First Magistrate. Must it, indeed! And is, therefore, no prosecution to be made, is no condemnation to take place? This is indeed the golden chain let down from Jove, to bind the earth in vassalage. And what becomes of our President's dignity under this strange doctrine? A subordinate agent abuses his trust—violates his duty—is guilty of mal-practice—he is arraigned; and because the culprit is convicted and condemned, is the dignity of Government, therefore, violated?

We have been told that a treaty when proclaimed by the President, is the supreme law, and that the previous assent of the Senate cannot be inquired into. Gracious God! and is it come to this, that the proclamation of our President shall be the supreme law of the land; that we must submit to it without inquiry? And how is this monstrous doctrine supported? Why we are told that because it is not proper in the case of a common statute to examine the journals of the two Houses, for the purpose of knowing whether the assent of each was given, therefore, we must not examine the Executive Journal of the Senate, to know whether two-thirds of the members present advised and consented to the ratification of a treaty. But are these cases at all similar? The law is signed by the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It contains, therefore, the best evidence in the nature of things, that the full assent required by the Constitution has been given. But is this the case with a treaty? No. The evidence of the consent of this Senate appears only by the extract from their minutes made out by their Secretary. And shall this preclude the inquiry, whether, in effect, that assent was given which your Secretary has certified?

We have been told by gentlemen, who seem to know all the merits of the case which is before the court, that the dignity of the President is involved in it. For my own part, I know nothing of the case, neither do I wish to know, for I have no authority to try it. But the gentlemen say the dignity of the President is involved, and that we are in duty bound to protect his dignity. But how? What have the petitioners asked? They have asked the evidence of a fact. And how are we to protect the President's dignity? By withholding that evidence. And are gentlemen then of opinion that the disclosure of facts will impair the dignity of our First Magistrate? Sir, I have no such apprehension. I trust that our President has acted properly, and that a full inquiry into facts must redound to his honor. Those who oppose this resolution seem to think otherwise. But I ask, are they prepared by their vote to declare that injurious opinion? Is there a gentleman in this Senate, who, when the yeas and nays are called, will record his opinion that the dignity of our President can only be preserved by withholding the evidence of facts?

We have been told, sir, by an honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE) that a right to examine, implies a right to correct and control. This proposition has been frequently advanced on different occasions. I never noticed it, because it appeared to carry within itself the sufficient evidence of its fallacy; but, since it is now again produced, it may be well to give it one moment's notice. A right to examine whether we agreed to a certain resolution, implies, it seems, a right to control our conduct. It may be a question in an insurance cause, whether damage was sustained by a violent wind at sea; does the examination into the fact imply a right to command the winds and the seas? Does the inquiry whether a ship has perished in a storm, imply the right to correct and control the Almighty raiser of storms?

We have been told by the member last up, from Georgia, that the evidence asked for by the petitioners, is useless; because, although the Senate may have approved of them as officers upon the President's nomination, yet it was in the discretion of the President to make or omit the appointment which alone could confer a right. That gentleman seems to be perfectly acquainted with the cause which is depending. He knows precisely what proof is needful for the prosecutor; and deeming that which he asks for to be insufficient, thinks proper to refuse it. It appears to me, sir, that this Senate is not the proper tribunal, either to examine the merits of the cause, or the validity and weight of the evidence. These are the proper subjects of inquiry elsewhere. If we adopt the gentleman's reasoning, however, we prejudice the cause; and I shall be glad to know, if this practice be adopted, what case can exist in which a like refusal may not be made. A client is advised by his counsel to apply to us for evidence in our power, as needful to support his rights. We refuse, because, in our opinion, that evidence is not alone sufficient.

But the same gentleman has told us he would not establish any general precedent. He would always judge of the particular circumstances; and under the particular circumstances of this case, he would withhold the evidence asked for. But will not this establish a general precedent? How are precedents established? Is it usual for judges to make decisions for the special purpose of becoming precedents? No such thing. They give judgment in a case which comes before them, and that judgment becomes a precedent for subsequent cases turning upon the same principle. I shall be glad to know, then, how a distinction is hereafter to be made between this and other cases. Here is a suit pending in a court of justice; and one of the parties applies for a piece of evidence which he is advised is material to establish his right. You refuse it. When in another cause, another party shall apply, on what ground will you grant that which you now refuse? Will you again prejudice the cause, and give them the proof because you deem it sufficient to carry the cause?

Mr. President, one word more on that unity of the Executive, which the gentleman last up is so much attached to. Although I have already spoken longer than I intended, I must pray one moment's attention. That honorable gentleman thinks there should be a perfect unity in the Executive power. The division of it is inconsistent with his ideas of good government, and therefore, he would admit of no inquiry as to facts which may have happened in the course of Executive volition, but give full credit to the commissions and proclamations of the President. These ideas, sir, consist well with monarchic institutions. Our Sovereign Lord, the King, is indeed possessed of the fullness of Executive power, and may exercise it at his pleasure. But as to our Sovereign Lord the President, the case is widely different. The American Constitution has given to this Senate a wholesome check upon his sovereign will. But according to the doctrine which gentlemen now advance, this check is nugatory—neither the people nor the courts shall question his commissions nor his proclamations. His commissions, it seems, confer complete authority. His proclamations are the supreme law. He may form what leagues he pleases with foreign Powers, and when he shall proclaim them, we are held to implicit obedience. To these doctrines, sir, I take leave to enter my dissent. I hope that when the rights of American citizens are invaded, not only the Supreme Court of the United States, but the lowest county court of the most remote district will dare to examine, to judge, and to redress. I hope this Senate will never, by an admission of such base and slavish doctrines, surrender the authorities conferred on them by our Constitution. I hope they will ever be ready to aid the cause of freedom and justice. And in this hope I shall give my vote for the resolution on your table.

Mr. CLINTON said that everything which had been uttered in the debate confirmed the first impression of his mind against the propriety of granting the prayer of the petition. The Executive Journal from the very nature of it was always secret. This secrecy never ought to be violated, unless some useful purpose was thereby to be attained. In the present case it was very evident to him that the copy prayed for could be of no real use to the petitioners. Giving them a copy of the Journal would, however, be an expression of the Senate's opinion that the testimony would be proper and useful in the suit of the petitioners. By a side-wind the Senate would thus be drawn to give their weight to one side of the cause. He believed this was the design of the petition, and the whole proceeding was insidious and factious. He declared that he was far from imputing these or indeed any improper motives to any of the Senate who were in favor of authorizing the Secretary to give the copy as prayed for; he was persuaded that they were aware of the perfect propriety of the course they now advocated.

But we are told, said Mr. C., by my colleague, that perhaps the Supreme Court may send a subpoena for our Secretary, and compel him to produce the Journal, in spite of our order forbidding him. Such a step would certainly bring things to a crisis, and for his own part he thought it desirable that measures might be taken for ascertaining the real extent of the power of the court. He was sure if they possessed the power contended for, the rule of the Senate ought to be altered, so as to forbid our Secretary from divulging the secret journal unless by order of the Senate or of the Supreme Court.

A great Constitutional question is now agitated in that court, involving a right to control the Executive. The business may not stop there. High officers of the Government of the United States might in the end be impeached and brought before this House. He as a member might be called to try, and to decide upon that impeachment, he therefore wished to remain neuter; to express no opinion beforehand, even by implication. He felt this to be his duty, and was clearly of opinion that it was the duty of the whole body, and that therefore they ought to refuse the copy of their journals.

Mr. Ross said that although the Senate decided upon all Executive business with closed doors, yet Executive proceedings were never considered secret, except in two cases: when the Senate imposes an injunction of secrecy upon the members, and in cases of confidential messages from the President. In all other cases the Executive business of the body is no secret; it has never been so considered in practice, for it is communicated by Senators without reserve; and when nominations are of moment they get into the newspapers before the Senate has decided upon them. Entire lists of nominations have been published antecedent to the sanction of the Senate, and yet no complaint was ever made here that a rule of this body had been violated. It cannot therefore be pretended that there is any injunction of secrecy to forbid the copy prayed for by the petitioners. The whole difficulty arises from a rule directing our Secretary not to give certified extracts of the Journal without express permission of the Senate. This regulation is wise and very useful. It represses idle curiosity, which, for improper purposes, might publish the votes of the Senate respecting officers in nomination, or nominations made and withdrawn by the President, before the Senate acted upon them.

But when a citizen states that he has a suit in a high court of justice; that the acts of this body and copies of our journals will be material testimony in his cause; when that part of the Journal asked for is not under any injunction of secrecy, or in its nature confidential, what pretence can there be for withholding it? Will our giving leave to take a copy of it express an opinion of the House whether it be legal testimony? whether it will support or defeat the suit? Surely not. Much less will it by implication insinuate that one party is right and the other wrong. It is a public record, of which any person interested has a right to demand a copy.

If the gentleman from New York (Mr. CLINTON) were a recorder of deeds or of wills in the county where he resides, would he refuse a copy of a deed or a will to a suitor in court? Would he feel that by giving a copy he lessened his impartiality as a juror or a judge in that suitor's cause, although at the time of giving the copy he knew nothing of the merits of the case? How could he possibly prejudice a cause the merits of which he had never heard? And yet we, who are now in the same situation precisely, are told that we are about to give an opinion.

There would be infinitely more force in alleging that, by a refusal of the copy, we undertake to decide between the parties; for in that case the Senate must be supposed to have examined the petitioner's cause of action, and to have found it such that the testimony prayed for would not sustain. An arbitrary refusal certainly would not extinguish the petitioner's right. No court would determine that a right shall be defeated because those who are in possession of testimony to support it choose to withhold that testimony, against all rules of justice. They will either admit inferior testimony to establish the fact, if material, or direct process to bring forward what is conceived to be legally attainable. Our refusal then will not defeat the suitor, and we shall be in the awkward situation of having interfered to stop a proceeding, without having the power of accomplishing our object.

Mr. R. said, that his observations would have ended here, had not new and highly dangerous doctrines been advanced by gentlemen on the other side, during this debate, against which he thought it his duty to enter his solemn protest. There was an end of all free and regular Government, if a commission from the President was conclusive evidence of a right to office against the journals of the Senate. There was an end to the Constitutional power of legislation, if the President's proclamation of treaties constituted the supreme law of the land, when the journals of the Senate showed that more than one-third of the Senate had voted against the acceptance and ratification of the treaty. The commission and the proclamation were good prima facie evidence, but might be encountered and defeated in the execution by the truth of the case as established by the journals; and courts in proper cases could not refuse to admit the inquiry when it became material. Those who have advanced this extraordinary doctrine will soon find, that if realized in practice, the transcendent powers of the President will leave little if any authority or security to the other departments of Government.

The question was then taken, will the Senate agree to this resolution; and it passed in the negative—yeas 13, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Plumer, Ross, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Stephen Sayre, stating that he was employed at a foreign Court in 1777, to procure arms, clothing, and other supplies, necessary for the common safety and defence, and praying compensation; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. TRACY, LOGAN, and BRECKENRIDGE, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st of January last, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia," reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, February 3.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee on the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia; and it was agreed that the consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

MEMORIAL OF JUDGES.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the report of the committee on the several memorials of the judges, under the late act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States. The committee report as follows:

That the petitioners were judges of certain courts, inferior to the Supreme Court, constituted by an act of the 13th of February, 1801, and duly commissioned to hold their offices during good behaviour.

That, while holding and exercising their offices, an act was passed on the 8th of March last, to repeal the said act of the 13th February, 1801, and transfer the duties of the said judges from them to others.

That a question has arisen whether, by reason of the premises, the said petitioners be deprived of their offices.

That this question, depending on the construction of the laws and Constitution of the United States, is not properly cognizable by the Senate.

The committee, therefore, conceive it improper either to give reasons or express opinions; but they consider it as a question of high and serious import, and believe that a speedy investigation and final decision is of great moment to the commonwealth.

Wherefore, they submit the following resolution:

Resolved. That the President of the United States be requested to cause an information, in the nature of a quo warranto, to be filed by the Attorney General against Richard Basset, one of the said petitioners, for the purpose of deciding judicially on their claims.

Mr. MORRIS said, I rise, Mr. President, as chairman of the committee whose report you have just had the goodness to read, for the purpose of explaining their reasons. If this were a common or an ordinary occasion, if no heats had been excited, if there were no unpleasant, no tormenting recollections, a measure so plain, so easy, so simple, would require neither argument nor persuasion. It would be adopted for its own interior evidence, and from the general sense of propriety. Unhappily, sir, this is not the case. Serious differences of opinion have existed, and still exist on the subject with which it is connected. From these have arisen disputes, divisions, bickerings. There is not, I fear, in the minds of men, that calm impartiality which is needful to fair investigation. There remains much of prejudice, of irritability.

Before I proceed to an explanation, therefore, I find myself reduced to the painful necessity of praying gentlemen to perform a great duty to this Senate, to themselves. I must entreat them to hear with patience, coolly to consider, and then decide according to the dictates of reason and justice.

Your committee have pursued the course which appeared to be proper, not only in itself, but according to the existent circumstances. Gentlemen will easily see that they might have made an elaborate report, containing a long detail of reasons to establish a favorite conclusion; and a slight knowledge of the forms of business will show, that they might have placed that report at length on your journals. But would this have been right? Would it have tended to conciliate? Would it have been a proper return for the unanimity with which your committee was chosen? Surely it would not; and is it not the duty of every good citizen to heal, as far as possible, the wounds of society? To calm those irritations which disturb its repose? To remove all things which may alarm, torment, or exacerbate?

We have heard from those who are more in the confidence of our Cabinet than we are, for we have no such pretensions, that there is reason to believe that this country is on the eve of war. I hope not. I hope we shall not be visited by so great a calamity. But if this be our doom, let us prepare to meet it like men, with boldness, with unanimity. Let us banish, let us destroy every circumstance that can excite or keep alive a spirit of party. Let the proudest foe be informed that he will find us firm. Let us march hand in hand, like a band of brothers, in the plain road of duty, and whether it lead to victory or death, we know it is the path to glory.

Mr. President, your committee have no intention, no wish to revive a discussion of points already settled. While the act of last session was in agitation, we opposed it steadily, pertinaciously. But that act has become a law, and to the authority of the law we bow submissively. While in suspense, we thought it our duty, as Senators, to oppose it. But since it has been adopted, according to the forms of the Constitution, we know that as citizens we are bound to obey. With these deep impressions, then, of what is due to the supreme law of our land, I shall proceed to the report of your committee, and endeavor to explain its several parts.

Gentlemen will perceive that the question which the memorialists have submitted to our investigation is, whether the law of last session has deprived them of their office of judge. Your committee consider this question as not being cognizable by the Senate. It is not for the Senate, nor the Representatives, nor both combined, to interpret their own acts. We are a part of the Legislature. A part of the Executive power is also delegated to us. If the Judiciary be added, it will constitute a tyranny. It is, indeed, the very definition of tyranny which has been given by those best acquainted with the subject. This Senate can have no wish to arrogate power. It is too just, too wise. If a sense of propriety did not prevent, prudence alone would forbid the attempt. This body is too feeble for the exercise of so much authority. Its form, its constitution, the mode and manner of its creation and existence, the strength and structure of its members, render it incapable of sustaining a greater weight of power.

The other House, indeed, immediate Representatives of the people, may do much. Borne on the heady torrent of popular opinion, they may, and they will usurp all power. This will be the first step towards military despotism. But the Senate can have no such madness. If we can preserve what the Constitution has entrusted to our care, it is as much as can reasonably be expected. Nor can we preserve it but by our integrity, and by that respect which justice inspires; for "our cloud of dignity is held from falling by the weakest wind."

The second proposition of your committee is indeed a corollary from the first. They consider this question as cognizable by the Judiciary alone. It is gone from us forever; and is, from the nature of things, before the Judiciary, in common with all other laws. To agitate it again can produce no benefit, can tend to no useful object, can accomplish no desirable end. Our opinion, whether to affirm or to deny, can be of no avail. The other House, indeed, have given an opinion favorable to the claim. This may appear a strange assertion to gentlemen who have amused themselves with reading in newspapers what are said to be the speeches of the members; but it is not from such sources that we are to derive the opinions of a Legislative body, nor do they rest on such frail authority. By recurring to the journals of the House, I find, that on the — day of —, they took up a resolution reported by the Committee of the Whole, purporting that the memorialists, "late judges of the circuit courts," have leave to withdraw their petition: and on this it was moved to strike out the words "late judges," &c., which motion was carried by a small majority. Now, then, I say that, if not directly, yet by clear implication, by strong and necessary inference, the House have declared, that these gentlemen are still judges. That they were judges is a fact unquestionable, and of public notoriety. To say, then, that they are not late judges is to say that they still hold their office, that they are now judges. Such, then, is the opinion of the House; and they, in the plenitude of their power, may venture to express that opinion; but we may not. It does not become us to prejudice. It is neither wise to commit our authority, nor just to influence the tribunals of our country.

Your committee, sir, have ventured to express their belief, that the question should be speedily settled. I learned in early youth, from the volumes of professional science, that it is expedient for the Commonwealth that a speedy end should be put to litigation; and if it be important that litigation should cease between man and man, how much more important that a litigated point of public right, which interests and agitates the whole community, should be laid at rest? And if this be important in the general course of things, is it not, under present circumstances, indispensable? And how is it to be effected? By an exertion of Legislative might; by force. Remember, force will excite resistance. Such is the nature of the human heart. Free citizens revolt with disdain at the exercise of force. But judgment commands their prompt, their willing obedience. When the law is known, when it is declared by the proper tribunals, all will bow to its authority. You, then, may expect a full, and quiet, and general submission. But while it is litigated and uncertain what the law is, differences will exist, and discord will prevail.

Is it wise to embark in great national enterprises, on the wild ocean of war, with a divided people? Can you hope for success while discontent sits brooding in the heart of our country? These judges, indeed, are not numerous; but they do not stand alone. They have relatives, friends, adherents, from blood, affection, principle. Why will you wound a class of citizens numerous and respectable? Can you, while they are aggrieved, injured, insulted, expect their cordial aid, support, and assistance? But to this it may be said, that these judges are but a feeble band; we can crush them and their opposition—we have the power. Yes, we have gigantic power; but, therefore, shall we use it with the ferocious cruelty of a giant? We can crush them. Yes, with the vast weight of Legislative force we can crush them. But is it honorable, is it magnanimous, does it become the brave? Will it give the people a confidence in their rulers? Will it give them a confidence in themselves, who have chosen such rulers? If, by an exercise of power, we could even prevent an investigation of our conduct, what would be the impression on the public mind? Suspicion and discontent, deep and dangerous.

It is under these impressions, sir, that your committee have presumed to offer the resolution on your table; and as some of the technical terms may not be familiar to every gentleman, it may be proper to state the kind of proceeding which is recommended.

The attorney general, or, as he is denominated in French idiom, the public accuser, will institute, before the proper tribunal, an inquiry by what authority these men claim to hold and exercise the office of judge. It will then be incumbent upon them, either to disclaim the office, and then there is an end of the question; or else (claiming it) to establish their right. And to do this they must prove two things: first, that the office exists, and secondly, that of right it belongs to them. Failing of either, their claim is gone.

Now, sir, it may be well to consider the decisions which may be made, and their probable effect. I take it for granted, that these gentlemen, who have asked a Judicial decision, will not disclaim, and that whatever judgment may be given in the first instance, the cause will be brought up to the Supreme Court. If the judgment, in the last resort, should be (as it probably would be) against the claim, all complaint will be quieted, and all opposition will cease. Some then, indeed, might triumph. For my own part, I should find in it great consolation—the consolation of knowing that, however wrong may have been my own opinions, the supreme Legislature of my country have done right. The pride of opinion might, indeed, be wounded; but God forbid, that from motives of pride, or from any other motive, I should hear, without deep concern, that the Legislature of my country have violated that sacred charter from which they derive their authority!

But suppose an opinion different, contrariant, or the very reverse (for that also is possible.) Will the judges rudely declare that you have violated the Constitution, unmindful of your duty, and regardless of your oath? No. With that decency which becomes the judicial character; that decency which upholds national dignity and impresses obedience on the public will; that decency, the handmaid of the graces, which more adorns a magistrate than ermine, aye, than royal robes; with that decency which so peculiarly befits their state and condition, they will declare what the Legislature meant. They will never presume to believe, much less to declare, that you meant to violate the Constitution. There will be no dangerous and hateful clashing of public authorities. They will never question the exercise of that high discretion with which you are invested. They will not deny your full supremacy. They will not examine into your motives, nor assign improper views. They will respect you so long as they preserve a due respect for themselves. They will declare, that in assigning duties to one officer, and taking them from another, you have to consult only your own convictions of what the interest or convenience of the people may require.—They will modestly conclude, that you did not mean to abolish the offices which the Constitution had forbidden you to abolish; and, therefore, finding that it was not your intention to abolish, they will declare that the offices still exist. Such, sir, would be the language of your supreme Judiciary, from the high sense they entertain of their duty. And, if it were decent to suggest in this Senate, that they were lost to a sense of duty, can it be believed, that a few feeble judges will dare oppose themselves to the power of the Legislature!

Having thus stated, in as few words as I could, the consequences of adopting the proposed resolution, I will now take the liberty to inquire the probable result of rejecting it.

I pray gentlemen, most sincerely, to consider the necessary consequence. Will it not be said that we are afraid to meet this feeble band upon the ground of free inquiry? That we are afraid to contend with the weapons of reason and argument? Will you not be strongly questioned? as thus: Are you confident that the judges are wrong? that their claim is unfounded? Hear them; refute them. Are you convinced, or do you only fear they are right? Reject their request, and, with the tyrant, assign as a reason your sovereign will. Such must be the conclusion. From this dilemma it is not possible for you to escape. If you are right, you will court inquiry, and shun it if you are wrong. But what is still worse, you cannot shun it. These memorialists can be heard, whether you will or no. Spite of your reluctance they can bring on an investigation. You may hide yourselves beneath the heaps of your privileges and powers, but you will be traced to your lurking place, and the strong arm of justice will drag you forth to the day. Yes, those feeble judges can bring on the inquiry in the very face of your power—will or not will—consent or not consent—submit or not submit—the investigation which they ask can take place. Is it not better, then, to meet them freely, fairly? to come boldly forward like men?

Sir, I will detain you but a few minutes longer. It appears to me essential to the dignity of the Senate, that you adopt this resolution. It is more noble to meet than to avoid legal investigation; and it is not a novel practice. There was a time when the American Legislature submitted their acts to Judicial decision. At that time WASHINGTON presided. Will it be said that the Administration was then too humble? He, indeed, was modest and unassuming; but he had an inborn dignity of soul which taught him, intuitively, to avoid vile shame and offensive pride. He, alas! is gone. Yes, he is gone, and, oh heaven! viperous slander pursues him to the silent tomb, and preys upon his ashes. Pardon me. The name of WASHINGTON has excited recollections which fill my breast with anguish. Well, let him be forgotten; but let us not forget what he always remembered. Let us not forget what is due to ourselves, to our country, to posterity; that posterity to whose judgment we commit our fame, the jewel most dear to honorable minds.

Mr. NICHOLAS rose for information. He wished to inquire whether, if the resolution should be adopted, a concurrence of the other House would be necessary, or whether the adoption by the Senate would be final.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated that a concurrence of the other House would not be necessary. The resolution was merely a request that the President would take certain steps for ascertaining a certain fact.

Mr. COOKE.—I rise, Mr. President, to follow the gentleman from New York, and not to bring forward any arguments of my own upon the subject that is now before you. I shall endeavor to follow him step by step, and answer all the observations that he has made. I shall not attempt to imitate his eloquence, and I could not do it if I should try. He has talked about that great man, General WASHINGTON, and said a great many fine things about him which I cannot repeat. I hope that I respect that man as much as the gentleman from New York, but I shall endeavor to lay aside the feelings that I might otherwise have, and keep to the point before the House; and leave him in his grave without disturbing him. It has nothing to do with the question under consideration now. The gentleman has wandered over a great many subjects, and he tells us in one breath, if we do not adopt this resolution, we shall be skulking in some places, lurking holds, I believe he said; and, in another breath, that we shall be dragged before the almighty judges of the nation.

Sir, this honorable Senate is an integral part of the Executive, of which the President is the head. How, then, can an inferior subordinate part direct the conduct of the superior part? It is clear, therefore, that we have no right as a part of the Executive, to order or request the President to do this. Have we the right, then, as a part of the Legislature? Can the Legislature assume upon itself the right of directing the Executive? What is it that is intended by this resolution? It is, sir, that the Legislature shall interfere with the Executive, and direct the President to interfere with the Judiciary for the purpose of getting pay for these omnipotent judges. Sir, these judges must depend on the Legislative will for their continuance in office, because the Legislature can make laws and repeal them when they please, and when a law is repealed, and there is nothing for the judges to do, and no office for them to hold, they cannot exercise power or receive pay; and this is according to the Constitution. How, then, can this Senate, by adopting the resolution, aid in procuring pay for these judges when they have nothing to do? Judges they are called; they are not judges; I suppose they have been judges.

The gentleman tells us we are going to be engaged in a war—bloody, I suppose—yes, no doubt, very bloody; and, before we get into this dreadful situation, he would do away all opposition and party, and unite us like a band of brothers, as he so eloquently described it; and all this he would do by one great and manly exertion, to pay these omnipotent judges, and thus prevent them from dragging us forth to shame and punishment.

Sir, my mind has no accordancy with such opinions. We have a good right to say whether we want the services of these judges or not, and if we do not, we don't need to pay them. I remember sir, that, last year, the gentleman gave us a likeness of a boat, and said, though we would not throw the man out of the boat, we would take away the boat from under him, and so he would be drowned. Now, sir, suppose I hire a seaman to work a boat for me, and I tell him that I will give him so much during good behaviour, and after awhile the boat becomes rotten and useless to me; he knows that I hired him to work that boat and for nothing else; can he come forward and say, you shall pay me for working that boat, when there is none to work? So, these judges; we found that we had nothing for them to do; the law was useless to us, and we repealed it; and now shall these judges come and demand their pay?

We are also alarmed with a picturation that the other House are going to assume all the power, unless we let the judges come in and keep them back. Sir, I am not afraid of the other House assuming the power. Does the gentleman recollect that they are the immediate Representatives of the people, and that the people will judge whether they conduct well or not? The people don't want these judges as guardians to protect them from the other House, nor from this House, nor any body else, unless, as the gentleman said last year, from their worst enemies, themselves. I believe that the people do not stand in need of guardians; they can take care of themselves, and we need not hire these judges to take care of them.

One sentiment of the gentleman I highly accord with, and that is, that force tends to opposition. I believe that this is true. The force exercised, or attempted to be exercised, by Richard Bassett and the others, has highly exercised my opposition to this resolution. They have attempted to compass by force or fraud—I think it is force and fraud both together—the payment of their salaries, and the exercise of powers which have been taken from them and given to others.

Mr. President, I shall now make only a small remark on the resolution itself, and sit down. The committee say, in their report, that the Senate cannot decide upon the petition, but the judges must decide it. For this purpose we must go to the common law. Sir, we have heard a great deal about common law, and about informations. I wish to know where we are to stop if we begin to authorize our courts to proceed by information. Are there not other kinds of information known to this common law, besides information in the nature of a quo warranto? If we adopt one form of the common law may not the courts assume more? Has the gentleman never heard of persons being seized and put to death upon information?

I wish to know where we are to stop; and whether we are to follow this common law till it leads us to those ermined and royal robes which the gentleman has so finely described to us? Sir, I believe that we have power, without common law or informations, to decide upon this petition, as well as upon other petitions that are brought before us. The very petitioning of us—what does that import? Does it not import that we have the power and the right of deciding upon the petition? If the judges did not think that we had the power and the right, what did they petition us for? I conclude, then, that we have the power and the right to grant or deny their request, and therefore I am free to say, that it is inexpedient to pay them for rendering no services.

The VICE PRESIDENT rose, and said he must call the attention of the Senate to the point in discussion, which was, whether the Senate would request the President to cause a process to be instituted for the purpose of ascertaining whether the petitioners still hold the office of judge. On this question it could not be in order to go back to a law passed at the last session, and to discuss the merits of that law.

Mr. JACKSON said, it appeared by the memorial that the petitioners considered themselves as being still judges, notwithstanding the law of last session. He thought, therefore, it could not be out of order to show that that act deprived them of their offices.

Mr. WRIGHT premised, that he would endeavor to confine his remarks to the point before the Senate. He felt no disposition to travel again over the ground which had been traversed at the last session.

The petition was addressed to both Houses, and prayed for two things; first, that Congress, in their Legislative capacity, would assign to the petitioners some judicial duties; and secondly, that they would authorize a judicial investigation of their claim to compensation. The committee, therefore, ought to have confined their inquiries to these points, and to have reported accordingly. Instead of that, they had reported a resolution which, if adopted, would be neither a grant nor a denial of the prayer of the petition. In doing this the committee had exceeded their powers, and proposed a measure which the Senate itself was not authorized to adopt.

Mr. WRIGHT took a review of the Constitutional powers of the Senate, in its Legislative and Executive capacities, and inquired, Have we any Constitutional authority to make such a request of the President? In what part of the Constitution is such power delegated to this House? Are we to make the request as private gentlemen, or as a Constitutional organ of the Government? If as private gentlemen, the act would clearly be a nullity; the President would still be at liberty to comply with the request, or not, as he might think proper. If as a Constitutional organ of the Government, where is the power given to the Senate? And what would be the remedy if he should refuse to comply? The Senate is the Constitutional adviser of the President in the formation of treaties, and in the appointment of officers, &c. The Constitution expressly declares that the President shall exercise these powers by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Here, then, it is their right and their duty to advise him. But the Constitution further says: "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Have the Senate any authority to advise him as to the faithful execution of the laws? They can go no further than they are expressly commissioned by the Constitution. The specification of particular Executive powers, by the Constitution, is a denial of all others. Admissio unius est exclusio alterius; and, as the Constitution has given no power to this effect, it follows that no such power can be exercised by the Senate. If the courts have power to try the validity of laws of Congress, they can exercise that power as well without the authority of this resolution as with it. If they have not the power, neither this House nor the Legislature can give it them. The duties and the powers of the Supreme Court are defined by the Constitution. Should the Senate, then, adopt the resolution, the Supreme Court would have no power to act under it unless that power is given by the Constitution. Let us, then, examine the authority of this court. The Constitution says: "In all cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers, and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction." Will the gentlemen say that these judges are Ambassadors, other public Ministers or Consuls, or that they are a State? If not, the Supreme Court can have no jurisdiction of the case, and the committee have imposed upon the Senate a resolution which they had no authority to submit. As to the law of the last session, by which these judges had been deprived of their offices, Mr. W. had no fear that the Supreme Court, or anybody else would attempt to set it aside. The whole nation has approved the measure, as many of those who opposed it have fatally experienced.

Mr. OGDEN.—Mr. President, upon an examination of this memorial, we shall find that it comprises two different subjects, first, a formal claim of office; second, a prayer that the legality of this claim may be submitted to a judicial decision.

In respect to the claim of office, Mr. President, it is stated in the memorial to have arisen out of the Constitution and a law made in pursuance thereof. This memorial refers to those words of the Constitution where it says: "That the judges both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office." It refers, also, to that act of Congress which, in connexion with the Constitution, gave existence to those judicial offices, to which the memorialists were appointed, and concerning whose continuance in office the question now is. This question is, whether, notwithstanding the repealing law of the last session, the memorialists have any color of claim to retain the character of judges and a capacity to officiate as such, so that existing duties may be defined or new ones assigned by law, without any further appointment by the Executive.

I do not mean, Mr. President, to argue upon the constitutionality of this law of the last session. It has been properly stated from the Chair, that such an argument, at this time, would not be in order. I trust, however, sir, that it will not be considered as out of order, to say that a great variance of opinion has existed in regard to the operation of that law. This is proved by the memorial itself, signed by so many characters who have been thought worthy of the honorable appointment of judges of the United States. Witness, also, the arguments which have been used both in this and the other House, and the recorded negatives in the journals, on the passage of the law. Witness, moreover, the public prints and more private discussions. Witness the great sensibility which it excited in the public mind. All these completely prove what is fully sufficient for my present purpose, namely, that this claim is not merely a pretence, without any color of right. It cannot be said that this claim deserves no attention. It is proper, therefore, that it should be decided upon, and the controversy put at rest. It must be presumed that this Senate, as faithful guardians of the rights of the nation, will adopt some mode whereby these important objects may be effected.

In respect to a decision on this claim, Mr. President, the memorialists themselves have appealed to the highest imaginable authority—an authority to which all must bow—I mean the authority of the law. Perhaps, sir, from my education and habits in life, I may think more highly of this authority than others whose education and habits may have been different. For my own part I think the appeal to be a proper and a just one, in which we ought to join fully and fairly. That we ought not to shrink from meeting this question in that forum whose sole and peculiar province it is to pronounce the law upon all cases “arising under the Constitution and the laws made under its authority.” I hope, sir, that the pride of the Senate will not be hurt by this proposition. Let us nobly bear in mind that no higher tyranny can exist than in such countries where the same corps which makes a statute can absolutely control its expositions. This would be, sir, to convert a Legislature into a national and revolutionary convention. I will now, Mr. President, inquire a little into the nature of a quo warranto, and endeavor to show, that the resolution on the table prescribes the proper mode for procuring the decision of the law on this question. To this end I shall beg leave to read a few lines from the third volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, page 262: “A writ of quo warranto is in the nature of a writ of right, for the King, against him who claims or usurps any office, franchise, or liberty, to inquire by what authority he supports his claim, in order to determine the right.” Again, in page 263, where speaking of an information in nature of a quo warranto, the book says: “This is properly a criminal method of prosecution, as to punish the usurper by fine for the usurpation of the franchise, as to oust him, or seize it for the Crown, but hath long been applied to the mere purposes of trying the civil right, seizing the franchise, or ousting the wrongful owner—the fine being nominal only.” Again, sir, in the act of Congress entitled an act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, passed September 24, 1789, section fourteenth, there is the following provision: “That all the beforementioned courts of the United States shall have power to issue writs of scire facias, habeas corpus, and other writs not specially provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the principles and usages of law.” Now, sir, as a quo warranto is a writ well known in the usages of the law, it is perfectly clear, under the foregoing authorities, that this question can be tried in the mode contained in the resolution. Should this mode be pursued, the defendant will either deny his claim, which will put an end to the business at once, or he will avow his claim, which will bring it to legal issue. In such case, the defendant will be obliged, for the success of his cause, to establish two things—first, the existence of the office; second, a right to exercise the duties which, now or in any future time, may belong to it, without any further appointment to the President. In order to this, sir, he will be under the necessity of showing, that he had been invested, during good behaviour, with a judicial office, that had been established by the Constitution, and that it was not within the Constitutional power of the Legislature to deprive him of it.

I shall now, Mr. President, delay the Senate while I notice such of the observations, which have been made by the gentlemen from Tennessee and Maryland, (Mr. COCKE and Mr. WRIGHT,) as appear to me, to be of the most importance. Both the gentlemen have insisted that it is improper for the Senate to advise the President, in any case, excepting where required by the Constitution. I answer that the Senate, in this resolution, do not advise the President. He is only requested to procure for the Senate judicial information, and a legal decision upon a matter in controversy, from a forum which is competent to decide in a case where the discussion here would be improper and out of order. Such requests for analogous information from the several great departments of the Government, have been frequently made, and as often complied with. Two occurred at the very last sessions, one in a claim made by Judge Symmes for the benefit of a contract entered into between him and the Government in regard to lands in the Northwestern Territory; another, in relation to claims in the State of Tennessee. The Legislature need the information which the adoption of this resolution will obtain, before they can, with propriety, as I conceive, either reject the memorial, or proceed to legislate upon it. This resolution merely requests such legal information and nothing further.

The gentleman, sir, from Tennessee, has further observed that it would be improper for the Senate to aid in any measure which may tend to procure compensation where no services have been performed. This resolution, Mr. President, contains no such proposition. Offices may exist without services, or even without compensations. There may be great force in the argument, that compensation can only follow services, but certainly the adoption of this resolution will not affect that question the one way or the other. It is not the question what duty or compensation is to be assigned, but whether the memorialists are still invested with judicial characters, to which any official duties may now or hereafter attach in virtue of their former appointment to office. I trust, therefore, that we shall not be told again, that we are making an attempt to gain compensation, where no services can be performed. The gentleman from Tennessee is of opinion, that the people do not need any protection against themselves. Were I permitted, sir, to express an opinion, it would be that the people do need a protection against Government, and that courts are their shields against oppression, as well as swords for the execution of the law. The hand of Government is large and broad, and heavy; courts are necessary to defend the people, against its violence; they stand between the people and the Government—through this medium only, can the rights of the citizen be assailed while even a semblance of the Constitution remains. But, sir, courts will cease to be this shield, whenever they shall cease to be independent. Whenever it is settled that judicial offices are holden at the will of the Government, courts must necessarily execute that will, or certainly expect to cease to be courts. It is time to know on what foundation our liberties stand, and whether the citizen can any longer rely upon the protection of independent courts.

Again, sir, this attempt to obtain a judicial decision has been called by the gentleman from Tennessee an act of force and fraud. Merciful heaven! This decent and respectful memorial—this well-timed and moderate resolution—acts of force and fraud. If we hear such language now, what may we expect hereafter?

The gentleman from Maryland has observed, that this memorial is addressed to the Legislature, and can only be acted upon jointly by both Houses. The answer to this has been already hinted at. No Legislative measure whatever can be adopted, until the question contemplated by the resolution shall be first disposed of; after that, only, can we undertake to legislate upon the subject of this memorial; to require information may be the act of either House separately, although to legislate must be their joint act.

Once more, sir, and I will have done. The gentleman from Maryland has argued that our courts have no jurisdiction over this question granted to them by the Constitution, and for this purpose has cited the clause in the Constitution which grants judicial jurisdiction. Permit me to observe, sir, that in making this citation, the gentleman has taken care, while he read every other part of the section, to omit that part which expressly grants this jurisdiction. The omitted part reads thus: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law or equity arising under this Constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made under its authority." And having read the residue of the section only, the gentleman triumphantly asks, whether these memorialists are Ambassadors or other public Ministers, or Consuls, or States, &c.

Let me now ask, Mr. President, with my honorable friend from New York, what have gentlemen to fear from the course which has been proposed in relation to this memorial? Why do they flinch from judicial inquiry? If reason and sound argument be on their side, they will certainly triumph. Let us not, therefore, I pray, usurp to ourselves the power both of enacting and exclusively expounding this law of the last session. When we passed the law, we did what belonged to us. We were then, in respect to it, functi officis. Its construction and exposition belong to the forum; to which the resolution on your table properly refers it.

Mr. JACKSON thought this subject was fully discussed at the last session, and that no new arguments could now be advanced. He considered the proceeding upon this subject as altogether novel. The petitioners have asked for one thing, and the committee have reported another. What end is to be answered by referring this question to the Judiciary? Do we doubt our own power, or our own justice? Ought we to go to the courts and ask them whether we have done our duty, or whether we have violated the Constitution? I shall not attempt, sir, to follow the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) in his attempt to raise the passions, but shall endeavor to confine myself to the question.

I consider this report of the committee as contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and Government of the country, and contrary to our own dignity. The courts have no power to control the proceedings of the Legislature or the Executive. In what capacity do we sit here? Is it as legislators alone? No; but as a part of the Executive power. Shall we, then, as legislators, condemn ourselves by adopting this report? Or can we, as a constituent part of the Executive, call upon the head of the Executive power to do such an act? But, sir, I consider the proceeding proposed by the resolution to be unconstitutional. The writ of quo warranto is a criminal process, and is followed by fine and imprisonment. No person can be called upon in a criminal action except by indictment of a grand jury. But here you would proceed against these men, who have not been charged with any crime, by a quo warranto, and perhaps would fine and imprison them. Where does this writ of quo warranto come from? Do we find any such thing in the laws of Congress? No, sir, it is derived from the common law of England, and has come down from the days of that great and good King, Alfred, when, as the gentleman told us last year, a purse of gold might hang for months on the side of the highway, and nobody would touch a penny of it. God forbid that we should ever give countenance to cruel and vindictive Star Chamber informations. I remember, sir, a time when an attempt was made to amend the Constitution by giving the courts power to proceed by information, but I lifted up my voice against it. I had heard too much of the proceedings by information in the Star Chamber in that country from which this writ is derived. I have heard many gentlemen in this House and the other who claimed the common law for our courts. If we go back to feudal times we shall see what a situation we should be in with this common law. Until the reign of William and Mary, women in England were not allowed the benefit of clergy. Let them be ever so learned or elegant, if convicted of a felony, they must be hanged, while the men, if they could merely read, escaped. Very pretty law this, indeed! Under this law your M^cCauleys, your Williamses, and perhaps some in the bosom of our own country, would be liable to ignominious death, and their husbands, who perhaps can scarcely read, while they are capable of writing the most elegant essays and the most sublime sentiments, these husbands, I say, under this blessed common law, would merely be burnt in the hand, while those elegant females must be hanged.

But why shall we go across the Atlantic for common law to restore these judges to their offices? As well might you say that the Pretender, because he called himself King of England, was a King, as to say that because these men call themselves judges, they are judges. I contend that they are not judges. Their office was taken away and given to others, who are now in the exercise of it. You might as well say that Louis the Eighteenth, who at present calls himself King of France, is King. Everybody knows that Bonaparte is.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) says, if you think yourselves right and these judges wrong, meet them, and examine their claim. But if you suspect or know that you are wrong, shrink from the investigation and refuse to let them be heard. Sir, I am willing to meet them, and I would meet them on this floor. Here I would decide their claim as they have asked us to do. This is the only proper place to meet them. Here I would decide that they have no office, and therefore are entitled to no salary. We cannot go out of our proper place to meet them in the courts.

Sir, if these men think that they still hold their offices, I believe that they may be satisfied without our passing that resolution. Let them take their seat upon the bench and see if the Marshal will obey them. Let them attempt to send a man to the whipping-post, or to jail, and I believe that they will find out whether they are judges or not. But if they wish to have the question decided for them, there is no occasion to trouble the court with it. We have the power and the right of deciding it. The petition itself proves that we have this power and this right, otherwise it would not have been sent to us. I hope, therefore, that we shall use it, and not give it away. To say that it must go to the Supreme Court, and that we have not authority to decide it, is begging the question. But I contend further, sir, that if we should even adopt this resolution, and the President should instruct the Attorney General to file the information, the Supreme Court have no power to decide the controversy. By turning to that common law which the gentlemen think so highly of, it will be seen that, in England, the judges cannot control an act of Parliament.

[Here Mr. J. read from some book, the title of which was not heard, that a certain lawyer had declared that Parliament have no power to do an immoral act, or one manifestly unjust, such as to make a man a judge in his own cause; but the commentator held it to be law, that no bounds could be prescribed to the power of Parliament, and that should they, imitating the example, of Herod, decree that all children under a certain age should be slain, it would be the duty of the judges to resign their commissions, but they could not declare the act void.]

Such, said Mr. J., appears to be the law of England, and there is so far an analogy between that Government and ours, that our judges cannot exercise a power over the acts of the Legislature which is denied even to the English judges. It is true that in England they have no written Constitution, and we have. We are so far superior to them in that respect. But still our judges have no power to control the acts of the Legislature. Though it may be true, as has been said, that this is not a resolution to pay money for nothing, still it is true that they petition for their compensations as well as duties to be assigned to them, and I believe, that if they had their salaries, they would be very quiet; and that, if we had last year made provision for paying them their compensations, we should never have heard of their coming to petition for duty to perform. I am against paying money to any person for doing nothing. I want no Irish pension list in this country, nor the red book of France, which I dare say the gentleman (Mr. MORRIS) has seen. In my view, office consists of duty, and compensation is given for the performance of duty. I cannot conceive of an office without service. The service of these men was taken away by the act of last session; and the office is therefore gone, and the compensation must go with it.

But suppose we adopt the resolution, and the President should refuse to comply, how can you get the question before the court? Can you compel the President to comply? Suppose, then, you command the Attorney General to file the information, will he comply? He is an Executive officer; he holds his commission at the will of the President. If he attempts to act contrary to the President's wishes, he will immediately be informed that there is no further occasion for his services. How can we command the Executive officers? Can the court, then, command the officers of the Executive? and by the way, I will take the liberty of remarking, that I believe the court are willing to go very great lengths. In like manner, if the court should send the Marshal with a mandamus to the Secretary of State, and he should be told, the moment you touch him your office ceases, can it be expected that he will risk his office in such business? How, then, can this business be done? It cannot be done by any body unless the President will consent.

On the whole, Mr. J. thought it sufficiently evident that this was a proceeding unknown to our Constitution and laws, and was nothing more than an attempt to inflame the public mind, and bring the Government into disrepute and ruin.

Mr. STONE.—Mr. President, I must be permitted to remark, that I have not been able to perceive the relevancy of many of the arguments which gentlemen have thought proper to advance upon the present occasion. This application is not for a quo warranto. The petitioners pray for a review of the laws and for an assignment of duties. They ask for no inquiry into the existence of the office, but for a process to obtain their salary. The committee, instead of reporting upon the prayer of the petition, report a quo warranto to ascertain whether they have any office. A quo warranto is the proper process against one who usurps the exercise of an office, but is never used in a case where there is a mere claim without an attempt to exercise. But even if it were, I cannot see the necessity of resorting to it in the present instance. It appears to me sufficiently clear that there can be no office where there is no service to be performed. That there is no service to be performed by the memorialists is proved by the petition itself, the first prayer of which is that such service may be assigned. I am, therefore, opposed to the adoption of the resolution for two reasons; first, the petitioners do not ask for any decision as to the existence of the office; and secondly, the writ of quo warranto is not the proper process for ascertaining the existence of the office; it merely tries the right to exercise an office.

I congratulate this Senate, sir, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) in particular, on his belief that the law passed at the last session was right. Time, which sets more things right than argument, will probably convince every body, not only of the propriety of that law, but of the impropriety of adopting this resolution. I am unable to perceive how the gentleman's remarks respecting General WASHINGTON apply to the question, or how his character is connected with a quo warranto.

Mr. WRIGHT rose again to remark that what had been said by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. OGDEN) respecting the case of Judge Symmes did not apply to the question. That was a request that the President would procure certain information upon a subject on which it was necessary that the Senate should act. This resolution was in the nature of a command to the President that he should command the Attorney General to institute a process not to enable the Senate to act, but to enable certain persons to exercise power and receive salaries. He conceived that there was no authority in this country competent to authorize a proceeding by information. It is not a writ, but a complaint to the court in the nature of an indictment. Information is the original proceeding in England, but is unknown in the courts of the United States. Here all must be by bill.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.—It is my intention, sir, to trouble you but a very few minutes. It will be remarked that the memorial contains two claims; a claim to office and a claim to compensation. Both these are claims under the Constitution, and both in the teeth of a statute. The question now is, by what procedure they can be decided? The honorable gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. OGDEN) says, it can be done in no other way than a quo warranto, as recommended in the resolution. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) says, it can be decided in spite of us, whether we adopt the resolution or whether we reject it. The question on the first of these claims is, whether the office has been destroyed or impaired by law? The proposition is, to submit this question to the Judiciary, to determine whether our law is good and valid. If the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) is correct in this doctrine, why should we trouble ourselves about it? The courts can decide the question as well without our interference as with it; and whether the doctrine is correct or not, I will never, by my vote, sanction such an inquiry. I think it would go to prostrate the Legislative power at the feet of the Judiciary.

Permit me now to say a few words as to the process, by information, in the nature of a quo warranto. This writ must lie, and only lie, against claims where there has been a user or usurpation of some franchise, and the judgment must be seizer, ouster, or extinguishment of franchise. To this point Mr. B. cited Jacobs' Law Dictionary, Modern Reports, and Kid's Criminal Prosecutions. How, then, can this question be brought before the court by a quo warranto? It is a simple claim without either user or usurpation; the very complaint of the petitioners is, that they are not in the use of the franchise, and they pray that duties may be assigned them. The proceeding is not, therefore, applicable to the case. Will you, then, for the sake of coming at a favorite case, presume a usurpation, and by a fiction of law, which is very common in England, but which I hope never to see introduced into this country, especially in criminal proceedings, will you proceed against these judges and render them liable to punishment for a misdemeanor? But, even then, the judgment will be ineffectual. If the office exists, and these men are entitled to it, the court can neither abolish it nor take it away. What if judgment should be rendered for the defendant? Must costs be awarded against the United States, and paid out of the Treasury? The court cannot then put these men in possession of the office. If the court has authority to declare the act of the Legislature void, and to reinstate these men in their offices, they may also decree them their salaries and order them to be paid. The adoption of the resolution, therefore, would in every view be nugatory and ineffectual.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Memorial of United States Judges.

SENATE

Mr. Ross observed, that if gentlemen who had spoken against the resolution were disposed to afford any relief whatever, candor would have induced them to suggest amendments. If they disliked informations in the nature of quo warranto, some other process might be devised, which would produce a decision, or the Attorney General might be directed to take effectual measures for obtaining an adjudication of the Supreme Court upon the claim these judges have set forth in their memorial. So, also, it would be very easy to alter the shape of the resolution if it be thought proper, that both Houses should act concurrently in this business. But as no amendment had been offered, he had been led to conclude, that it was not to the form, but to the substance of the resolution, that they were opposed.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE) had insisted strongly upon two objections to the report of the committee; and he would first notice that which had been last urged; namely, that the information would not lie, because there was not an actual user, or usurpation; that there could be no judgment of ouster without an user, and therefore the process would be ineffectual. In this position the gentleman was certainly mistaken, for the law authorities, already quoted in this discussion, prove expressly, that it will lie where there is a claim of office, or a colorable title set up. The process contemplated is not a quo warranto, but an information in the nature of that writ. At common law there would be no judgment of ouster upon such an information; after trial of the right, and decision against defendant, the court could only impose a fine, which, generally speaking, is merely nominal. We have no statute giving power to pronounce the judgment of ouster. The simple inquiry will be, whether these judges claim or exercise powers or offices unauthorized by law. Should they renounce all claim, there is an end of their present complaint; we should hear no more of it. If they persist, their right must be set forth, and it will be investigated and decided by the court in their judgment upon the information. This is exactly what the judges have desired, and there can be no doubt of the efficacy of the process proposed. But the gentleman has principally dwelt upon another objection which is of great magnitude. He is unwilling to authorize any proceeding in the Supreme Court which may draw into question the validity or constitutionality of an act of Congress. And he contends that the exercise of such a power by the Judiciary, is a prostration of the sovereignty of the Government now vested in the Legislature.

Mr. R. said that it was with infinite surprise and regret, that in the last session of Congress, he had heard this authority of the courts questioned and denied by men of high influence in the national councils. In his apprehension, this new doctrine was not only incorrect, but of the most dangerous tendency. How is the sovereignty of our Government affected by the exercise of this power? The sovereignty is vested in the people. For all Legislative purposes, this sovereignty is represented and exerted by Congress; for all Executive purposes, by the President; for all Judicial purposes, by the Judiciary. Each, when performing the functions of their respective departments, may be said to be clothed with sovereignty, but neither possesses it entire, nor exclusively, nor for any other purpose than that of executing the powers devolved upon it by the Constitution. All were created to manage a delegated power. They are co-ordinate, not subordinate. Congress is the people making laws. The President is a representative of the people carrying their laws into effect in an orderly manner. The Judiciary is the nation in its most august capacity, sitting in judgment to do justice. The full exercise of all its power by one of these departments, certainly does not derogate from or prostrate the sovereignty of the others, if they possess anything that may be called sovereignty.

It is manifest, from the Constitution, that its authors were aware of danger from attempts of the Legislature to abuse their great powers. Experience had admonished them on this subject in almost every State. Therefore, Congress was expressly restrained from passing laws imposing duties upon exports, ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, laws affecting emigration, or certain rights of individual States. [Here Mr. R. read over all the prohibitory clauses of the Constitution.] Suppose such laws passed in direct violation of the Constitution, where is the remedy if the gentleman's doctrine of Legislative supremacy be right? Not in Congress, for they are the wrongdoers; not in the President, for he is the organ to execute, not to interpret, the laws; not in the States, for they might so differ that no two would exactly agree, and this would lead to the most furious and destructive disputes; not in the people, for there is no mode of collecting their opinions. The Judiciary, then, seems to be the only body to which we could look for protection from such laws; their agency becomes necessary to give the laws complete effect upon individuals. The Constitution is the supreme law: it is the duty of a judge to compare acts of the Legislature with this great charter, and pronounce whether the special delegated power has been exceeded or not. The Constitution expressly directs them to take cognizance of all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. If, then, a citizen be sued before a court of the United States for a tax imposed upon the produce of his farm when exported; if he be prosecuted under an ex post facto law; or arrested under a bill of attainder, will any Senator rise and say, that a court sworn to support the Constitution, is nevertheless bound to give judgment for the prohibited tax, and to send the man to execution who has been attainted without a trial? Either the law or the Constitution is a nullity. If the new doctrine be true the law must prevail. If so, why provide any prohibitions or exceptions in a Constitution, and why ask any solemn pledge to support it? The court, when pressed for its judgment, must declare which shall prevail, and if they do their duty they will certainly say, that a law at variance with the Constitution is utterly void; it is made without authority and cannot be executed. By doing so the court do not control or prostrate the just authority of Congress. It is the will of the people expressed in the Constitution which controls them.

Since the adoption of our Constitution this question has been more than once before our courts. The judges of the Supreme Court refused to execute the law relative to pensions claimed by invalids, and transmitted their reasons to the President, who laid them before Congress. The law was altered so as to assume an unexceptionable shape. Here the difficulty was ended. The carriage tax was thought by some to be unconstitutional, and by a refusal to pay it, suit was brought and the question was solemnly debated and decided in the Supreme Court. The tax was held to be a legal one. But had it been decided otherwise, what officer would have dared to collect it after such a decision?

The laws of different States have been questioned in the same court. An act of Assembly of Pennsylvania has been declared void, and although the decision affects an immense real property in that State, yet the opinion of the court seems to have been submitted to. Nay, so general has been the impression, that our courts possess this great power, now denied, that several honorable members of this House have censured the judges for not declaring that the Sedition act was unconstitutional. If they had power to do so respecting that act, why deny them the power to do other acts? Where does their power end? Let us know its limits, that we may be sensible when we can, and when we cannot draw this protecting power into activity.

The framers of our Constitution, sensible that in this, as in all other free Governments, there would be a tendency in the Legislature to overstep their authority and abuse their power, not only ordained the limitations which have been noticed, but, fearful that judges might become obnoxious if they dared to do their duty, they protected the Judiciary, by declaring them independent of the Executive as to the tenure of their offices; and of the Legislature as to their compensation. It was hoped that they would then look steadily at their duty; and that in turbulent times they might be able to restrain, and control the hand that might attempt oppression. But now it is discovered that office, "during good behaviour," means during the will and pleasure of a majority of Congress. The judges, your memorialists, complain, that they were once regularly appointed judges under your law of February, 1801. That by a law of last session, their duties are transferred to others. When that law was under consideration in this House, we were told that its friends did not undertake to remove judges from office, that the repealing law expressed no such sentiment; that its effects upon the judges might be examined and determined thereafter. Now, when these very judges ask us to define their duties, we are told, by the same gentlemen, that the judges are not in office; that they were actually removed by the late law. Then it eventually follows, that they were removed by Congress; that they were dependent upon the will of Congress, and not upon their good behaviour: and it also follows, by necessary implication, that Congress, by repealing the law under which the Supreme Court is organized, may remove the judges of that court, and transfer their duties to a designated number of judges of the district courts. The independence of your judges is then but an empty name. But suppose the repealing law to be now repealed. This repeal would remove the circuit courts of February, 1801. Who would be the judges of those courts? The former judges have not resigned. They have not been removed by impeachment. They still claim to be judges. Could the President appoint new judges when the old ones are ready to execute the duties of the office? It is certain that they were once judges, and held circuit courts. How, then, were they put out of office? Have they not a capacity and an official relation which other men have not? Why not ascertain and settle what this relation is? They request us to do so. Their request is not to decide ourselves but to define or authorize a mode in which a judicial decision may be had upon what they term their right. Our ideas of independence and fancied sovereignty ought never to carry us so far as to deny an investigation of right. We are not the legal tribunal for trying the rights of citizens. Send it then to the courts; if they decide against the right, we shall be under no obligation of assigning duties to these judges. If they give a contrary decision, we shall have full evidence that we ought to define their official duties and provide for their compensations. By refusing a fair trial at law, we assume the judicial power of interpreting our own laws, and to be both Legislature and Judiciary.

This power does not belong to us; it has been expressly delegated by the people to another department. It has been exclusively exercised by that department ever since the beginning of our Government. Until lately it has never been questioned. It has not been complained of by any of the States, although more than one State has been affected by it; and it seemed to be the only peaceable and fair way of terminating questions of this description, without burdening the Senate with undue responsibility. He hoped, therefore, that the report of the committee would be adopted, or, at all events, be so modelled as to produce the inquiry and decision prayed for by the memorialists.

MR. NICHOLAS.—Mr. President, the question before us is, not whether the courts may exercise the power of declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional, and therefore void, nor whether we will now give them that power. The question is whether we will call upon the President in this way, and direct him to perform a certain Executive act. I contend, sir, that we have no power to do this, and that even if we had the power, it would be inexpedient, in the present instance, to exercise it.

This memorial, sir, is addressed to both Houses of Congress in their Legislative capacity, and whatever is done upon it should be concurred in by both. The other House has already expressed one opinion, and declared that the prayer of it ought not to be granted. How would it appear for us to adopt this resolution, and thus express a contrary opinion? I am clearly of opinion that we have no right to make this call, and I am also clearly of opinion, that these judges have no claim to either office or salary. The office which they held has been abolished, and the right of compensation, which was but an appendage of the office, was extinguished with it. I am, therefore, prepared to meet the question in every shape in which it can appear, and to give it my decided negative.

I am astonished, sir, to hear it said, that we must wait till this question is decided before we can act upon the petition, and either grant or deny the prayer of it. If I thought as those gentlemen profess to think, that the office still exists, and that these men are still judges, instead of sending them to the courts, where they can get no relief, I would make an appropriation for the payment of their salaries. But I believe that they have no claim, and am therefore ready to vote against it.

I am astonished, sir, to hear this case likened to the case of Judge Symmes. There appears to me to be no analogy between them. One was a call for information upon a subject on which it was necessary for us to legislate. The other is a decree directing the President how to act in the execution of his office.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) had promised us that, if we adopt this resolution, we shall have peace and union; that all party asperities will be done away, and that we shall unite like a band of brothers. Would not peace and union have been better promoted by keeping this subject out of sight, and not, by the introduction of it, attempting to agitate the public mind, and irritate party animosities? Sir, the adoption of this principle would carry us to lengths which cannot be foreseen. The principle of proceeding by information would open a door to all kinds of tyranny and oppression, by suffering criminal proceedings to be instituted without the intervention of grand juries. I hope we shall prevent the evil by putting our negative upon the resolution.

Mr. MORRIS.—Mr. President, although the arguments which have been advanced against this resolution have been fully answered by my friends, I pray your patience and permission to take some slight notice of a few of them; not, indeed, to show their futility, (for that has been done already,) but to mark the relation which they bear to each other. We are told, in the first place, by the gentlemen on my right, (Mr. JACKSON,) that we are an integral part of the Executive authority, of which our President is the fountain and head; and thence it is inferred, that we ought not to apply for his kind assistance. Sir, this may be logical argument; it may, perhaps, be conclusive; but really I do not understand it.

We have heard much of the dangerous nature of an information. Gentlemen seemed afraid of information; they are afraid, too, of the common law. They will next, I suppose, be terrified at that other hideous spectre, common sense. They tell us that the writ of quo warranto is a criminal process; that the punishment is fine and imprisonment. They ask whether, American citizens are to be subjected, without indictment, to these pains and perils. The proper distinction has already been taken by the friends near me, between the writ of quo warranto, and the information in the nature of a quo warranto. The argument of our adversaries goes to show, that the memorialists should not be subjected to such grievous persecution. A sufficient answer to all which has been said, or can be thought or said on this subject, is, that if they do not choose to risk the consequences, they have only to disclaim. On such disclaimer the suit must cease. If, then, it proceed to judgment, it must be by their choice, and to the willing there is no injury. But it seems that this resolution is an attempt to call in question your Legislative omnipotence. As well, says the gentleman, might you say that the late Pretender was King of England as that these men are judges. As well, says he, may you say that the unfortunate Louis the Eighteenth is King of France while Bonaparte fills the throne. Are we, then, to understand the gentlemen that power makes right? Or does he mean to say, that because we have the power, it is vain in the petitioners to pursue their right? The same gentleman made some allusion, I know not what, to a red book. But he read to us doctrines from a book which is indeed red. Likening your acts to British statutes, he tells you, that if your judges be commanded to slay the innocent, they are bound to obey.

[Mr. JACKSON rose to explain. The VICE PRESIDENT informed him he would have an opportunity to reply.]

I might, said Mr. M., have misunderstood the gentleman, but I believe not. It must be fresh in the recollection of this Senate, that he read to us the opinion of some commentator on the law of England as to the binding force of an act of Parliament. The declaration of a learned Judge, that Parliament could not do an act so immoral as to make a man judge in his own cause, is called in question, and the commentator declares their power to be unbounded, unless, indeed, by the physical limits which the Almighty has established in the order of his creation. To elucidate the doctrine, he goes so far as to say, that should the Parliament, in imitation of Herod, give orders to slay all children born within a certain period of time, the judges can avoid obedience only by resigning their commissions. Hence, then, it is to be inferred, that should you think proper to issue a mandate as cruel as that of Herod's, your judges must imbue their hands in the blood of innocence. Such, it seems, is your power, and such must be their obedience!

Not content with this broad claim of unlimited power, the gentleman has thought proper to descend into the details of this business, and to point out certain difficulties which the petitioners must encounter, even if it be admitted that they have right, and that our courts will endeavor to do them justice. If, says he, you address the President, the President will not comply with your wishes. You cannot compel him. If you direct the Attorney General to file the information, he will not do it without the President's order. He holds his office during pleasure; and if, as you pretend, these petitioners should take some other course, without the order of the President, or the agency of the Attorney General, and even if the judges should decree in their favor, to whom will they issue process? The Marshal also holds his office during pleasure. He won't obey, or if he should, the President will tell both him and the Attorney General that he has no further need of their services. Will he, indeed? Will he interpose his authority to prevent the execution of law? Will he dare? No. He dare not. He dare not. The present incumbent of that high office has no such dangerous disposition; and no future President will dare. I am sure the gentleman has not been authorized to intimate that the President has any such intention or disposition. That honorable gentleman is so filled with apprehension on the present occasion; he has such horror of the common law, that he seems to fear, if this resolution be adopted, we may proceed to burn the palm of his female friends. He is alive to the danger of learned ladies. We, sir, wish to make no fiery impression on ladies, learned or unlearned. We wish but to promote justice and establish right, by the salutary influence of reason and law.

An honorable member from North Carolina, (Mr. STONE,) has told us that the resolution is not founded on the petition. They, says he, ask one thing, and we are about to give them another. In Scripture phrase, it might be said, they ask for bread, and we give them a stone; they ask for a salary, and we give them a quo warranto. But this observation is, I humbly conceive, unfounded. Look at this petition. They claim what they say is their office. They ask that duties be assigned to it. They declare a willingness to submit their right to legal investigation. This right is the point on which the merits of the petition turn, and the resolution goes directly to that essential point.

The same honorable member has told us that there can be no question on the subject, for that office implies duty: and, as the petitioners aver, they have no duties to perform, they, of course, acknowledge that they have no office. It is possible, sir, that in the Latin language, the word officium may be synonymous with duty. But inferences from etymology cannot be admitted as argument. In English office does not imply duty. If it did what would become of the long list of sinecure offices, about which there has been so much of patriotic complaint? The same honorable member has rejoiced that I should now acknowledge what I last session denied, namely, that the law then passed is Constitutional. I made no such acknowledgment. I declare again, that, sitting here as a Senator of the United States, I am not now competent to decide on that law. This is the province and the duty of the judge. I feel it my duty, as a citizen, to obey; and believe that all of us owe to our fellow-citizens an example of obedience, of respect; and submission. This is not, as has been intimated by the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) a question whether the judges are superior to the Senate; still less whether the judges are superior to the whole Legislature. No such question can arise while the departments of Government preserve a proper respect for themselves. The judges will never be so wild, so absurd, so mad as to pretend that they are superior to the Legislative power of America. The same sense of decency and self-respect will, I trust, prevent this Senate from claiming a superiority over the judges. Above all, I hope we shall not, by the vote of this day, declare that the Senate is superior to the law. But the honorable gentleman has asked, whether you will submit your acts to the question, the decision, the control of the Judiciary? I answer, by asking the gentleman how he will avoid it? When we have passed a law, how is it to be executed, unless by the aid of that Constitutional organ? Will the gentleman say, that having enacted a statute, we must join the other House, and arming ourselves with clubs and staves, sally forth to the world to compel obedience? He will not. Sir, we must rely on the tribunals for carrying our laws into effect, according to their conception of the true intent and meaning of those laws. We must, therefore, submit to the courts the interpretation of our acts. Yes, spite of your lofty pretensions, we must submit; and the only question that remains is, whether we shall do it reluctantly, and therefore ungracefully, or whether we shall do it frankly, fully, freely, in the manner consistent with our dignity? Yes, sir, we must submit. I have said, and here repeat, that these petitioners can force on a decision. They may take an affidavit, or deliver a person on bail in a feigned action, or in twenty other modes, which the acuteness of professional skill may indicate, they may bring this question before the proper tribunal. What, then, do we ask? We ask that you court an investigation which you cannot decline.

But, says the same honorable member, why apply to the courts at all? Their decision can do you no good. They can give to the petitioners neither duty nor salary. True. But until it be decided that the petitioners hold an office, can we assign duties, or can we provide salaries? It is the same train of argument that my honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) has pursued, in advising us, as the shorter course, to move an appropriation for the purpose of paying them. This, says he, would bring the question, whether they are in office, to a short decision. But, sir, this is precisely the question which we cannot rightfully decide, because it depends upon the construction of our own acts. The gentleman must pardon me also for saying, that I have not sufficient confidence in them to warrant such a procedure. If the appropriation were moved, they would rise and tell us we were about to give salary where there was no duty. That we are faithless guardians of the public treasure. That we would squander it to provide for favorites, without reason and almost without pretext. If, to avoid this charge, we attempt to assign duties, we shall be told that we have no right to appoint officers; that this is among the high prerogatives of our First Magistrate; and if, in reply, we assert that these are still officers, it will be claimed, and we shall be told, that such a question is proper for judicial inquiry; that it is one which we are not competent to determine. Will gentlemen say that these suppositions are disingenuous? Let them look at the conduct they have pursued, and which they now pursue. When it was deliberated last session, whether the law creating these judges should be repealed, we held up to them that article of the Constitution which prohibits the Legislature from taking away the office of a judge; and what was the answer? It was this: We do not mean to infringe that article. We do not touch the Constitutional right to office. We mean merely to repeal a law enacted by a preceding Legislature: and now they tell us that this same law has, in effect, taken away those offices, which were not, it seems, to be touched by the law, and which it was acknowledgedly unconstitutional to touch.

But it is asked, again and again, if the court have a right to decide without your interference, why will you interfere? Again and again I answer—because it more comports with our dignity to court than to fly from a decision. It would not, perhaps, have been proper to go out of our way in pursuit of it. Certainly we should never have taken on ourselves to bring the subject before this Senate. But the petitioners, using their right as citizens, have stated to you what they conceive to be a grievance, and ask of you to grant redress. The whole business being thus before you, it is no longer a matter of choice to leave it unnoticed: you may, perhaps you will reject this resolution. But I caution you once more to beware of the conclusion which must be drawn from that conduct. Men used to the possession and exercise of authority, know and acknowledge its just bounds. As they feel no desire to usurp power, so they feel no degradation in submitting to that which others may lawfully exercise. They know that true dignity consists in obedience to the dictates of duty. Not so with men hastily and highly elevated. I am much afraid, sir, that the people of this country will think, believe, and say that, new and raw in the exercise of power, we feel its insolence, and can brook neither restraint nor contradiction.

Mr. JACKSON rose in reply to Mr. MORRIS. He said it was not his intention to intimate that the judges could be compelled to slay innocent children. All that he meant was, that the judges have no power to control the acts and laws of the Legislature. The gentleman from New York had declared that the President would not dare to dismiss officers who might attempt to act contrary to his will. Mr. J. said he believed it would be the duty of the President to dismiss them, and he had no reason to think that he would be afraid to do his duty. As to the intimation that the President had directed him or any other person to express such a sentiment, he would reply that he believed that there had been no such thing as a Presidential caucus under the present Administration. For one, he could say that the President had never consulted him, and he believed the same was true of others.

The gentleman is mistaken, said Mr. J., when he supposes that I think that the ladies are in danger. I have no fear about the ladies. I only made that remark, as the gentleman appears to be very fond of common law, just to let him see what that blessed common law was. I am not a lady's man, sir, and I believe I make as few speeches for the purpose of being heard by the ladies, as any man in this House. Indeed, I don't know but the speech I made to-day was the first I ever made for the ladies in my life, if that was one.

The question on agreeing to the resolution was now taken, and determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dayton, Dwight Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Plumer, Ross, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brown, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Jackson, Logan, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

Ordered, That the memorialists have leave to withdraw their memorial.

FRIDAY, February 4.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Messonnier," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

The bill brought yesterday from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen," was read.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio, and the motion made 31st of January last, for an amendment, having been withdrawn,

Ordered, That this bill pass to a third reading.

On motion, the consideration of the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia," was postponed to Monday next.

Ordered, That Mr. BALDWIN be of the committee on the petition of Stephen Sayre, in place of Mr. TRACY, excused on account of the ill state of his health.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee, reported amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington;" and the amendments were read and ordered to lie for consideration.

SENATE.

Proceedings.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

A motion was made that a committee be appointed to examine what amendments, if any, are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of the Kentucky river,' and that they have leave to report by bill.

And it was agreed that this motion should lie for consideration.

MONDAY, February 7.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the Board subsequent to their report of the 16th of December, 1801, as far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this Board, dated the third day of the present month, and in the proceedings of the officers of the Treasury therein referred to, which are herewith referred to, and prayed to be received as a part of this report; and the communication was read.

Ordered, That it be printed, together with the documents therein mentioned, for the use of the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. NICHOLAS, J. MASON, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the 19th January last, the Message of the President of the United States of that date, together with the account therein referred to, be discharged.

Ordered, That Mr. Ross be on the committee to whom was referred, on the 25th of January last, so much of the Message of the President of the United States, of the 18th, as relates to the salt springs on the Wabash, in place of Mr. FRANKLIN, absent by permission.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry Messonnier," was read the third time and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the sale of a piece of land, parcel of the navy yard, belonging to the United States, in Charlestown, in the State of Massachusetts, to the proprietors of the Salem Turnpike Road and Chelsea Bridge Corporation," was read the third time and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The bill to provide for the execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio, was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia;" and after progress, Ordered, That they be recommitted to the original committee, further to consider and report thereon.

On motion, it was agreed that the consideration of the amendments of the committee to the bill, entitled, "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington," should be postponed.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE presented the petition of Robert Ross and others, inhabitants of the county of Fairfield, in the State of Ohio, purchasers of certain lands of the United States, praying remission of the interest on the purchase-money, or such other relief as Congress may deem just and equitable; and the petition was read.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, ROSS, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

TUESDAY, February 8.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 25th of January last, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Hugh Alexander and others," reported it without amendment; and it was agreed that this bill should lie for consideration until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the committee to the bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the city of Washington;" and having adopted them in part, and agreed further to amend the bill, on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading as amended, it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made on the 4th instant—

"That a committee be appointed to examine what amendments, if any, are necessary to be made to the act, entitled 'An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river;'"

And the motion having been amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine what amendments, if any, are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river,'" and that they do also examine into the expediency of opening a land office in the Indiana Territory during the present session; and that they have leave to report by bill or bills.

Ordered, That Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, ROSS, and TRACY, be the committee.

WEDNESDAY, February 9.

On motion, by one of the majority, to reconsider the vote passed yesterday on the bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington;" it was agreed that the motion should lie for consideration.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the 7th instant, the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia," reported further amendments; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the granting of clearances to ships or vessels of the United States lying in the river Mississippi south of the southern boundary of the United States, and therein to amend an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes,'" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up from the House of Representatives for concurrence was read, and, by unanimous consent, the rule was dispensed with, and the bill was read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. DAYTON, BRECKENRIDGE, and ANDERSON, to consider and report thereon.

THURSDAY, February 10.

Mr. TRACY presented the petition of Henry Glen, stating that he had rendered important public services during the Revolutionary war, personally, and by others under his direction, for which both he and they remain unpaid, and praying compensation; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee instructed to that purpose, on the 27th January last, reported a bill to revive an act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," and the bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

FRIDAY, February 11.

Mr. DAYTON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 9th instant, the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the granting clearances to ships or vessels of the United States lying in the river Mississippi south of the southern boundary of the United States, and therein to amend an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes,'" reported amendments; which were read, and agreed to.

Ordered, That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The bill to revive an act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," was read the second time, and ordered to the third reading.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Hugh Alexander and others;" and, on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide an additional armament for the protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Moses White;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were read, and ordered to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the amendments, reported by the committee, to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia;" and, having in part adopted them, on motion further to amend the bill,

Ordered, That it be recommitted to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, ROSS, and WRIGHT, further to consider and report thereon.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the petition of John C. Symmes, together with the report of the Attorney General, of the 28th of January last, made thereon, be referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, BALDWIN, and TRACY, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE notified the Senate that he would, on Monday next, ask leave to bring in a bill to alter the time of holding the court of the United States for the Kentucky district.

On motion, it was agreed that the motion made on the 9th instant, for the reconsideration of the vote on the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington," be the order of the day for Tuesday next.

MONDAY, February 14.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Paul Coulon, praying indemnification for loss sustained by the detention of the prize ship Betty Cathcart, of which he was owner, in the port of Wilmington, North Carolina; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Moses White," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, BALDWIN, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to provide an additional armament for the protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. CLINTON, ANDERSON, and JACKSON, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to provide for granting clearances to the ships or vessels of the United States lying in the river Mississippi, south of the southern boundary of the United States, and therein to amend an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes,'" was read the third time, and passed with amendments.

On motion, it was agreed that the third reading of the bill to revive an act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," should be postponed until to-morrow.

Agreeably to notice given on the 11th instant, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE had leave to bring in a bill to alter the time of holding the court of the United States for the Kentucky district; which was read, and ordered to the second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States;'" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States,'" reported amendments; which were read.

Ordered, That they lie for consideration.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Lewis, his Secretary.

THE MISSISSIPPI QUESTION.

After the Senate had finished its deliberations upon the Legislative business before it—

Mr. Ross rose and said, that although he came from a part of the country where the late events upon the Mississippi had excited great alarm and solicitude, he had hitherto forbore the expression of his sentiments, or to bring forward any measure relative to the unjustifiable, oppressive conduct of the officers of the Spanish Government at New Orleans. He had waited thus long in the hope that some person, more likely than himself to conciliate and unite the opinions of a majority of the Senate, would have offered efficacious measures for their consideration; but, seeing the session now drawing to a close, without any such proposition, he could not reconcile a longer silence either to his own sense of propriety or to the duty he owed to his constituents. He would not consent to go home without making one effort, however feeble or unsuccessful, to avert the calamity which threatened the Western country. Present appearances, he confessed, but little justified the hope that anything he might propose would be adopted, yet it would at least afford him some consolation, hereafter, that he had done his duty, when the storm was approaching, by warning those who had power in their hands of the means which ought to be employed to resist it.

He was fully aware that the Executive of the United States had acted; that he had sent an Envoy Extraordinary to Europe. This was the peculiar province, and, perhaps, the duty of the President. He would not say that it was unwise in this state of our affairs to prepare for remonstrance and negotiation, much less was he then about to propose any measure that would thwart negotiation, or embarrass the President. On the other hand, he was convinced that more than negotiation was absolutely necessary, that more power and more means ought to be given to the President, in order to render his negotiations efficacious. Could the President proceed further, even if he thought more vigorous measures proper and expedient? Was it in his power to repel and punish the indignity put upon the nation? Could he use the public force to redress our wrongs? Certainly not. This must be the act of Congress. They are now to judge of ulterior measures; they must give the power, and vote the means to vindicate, in a becoming manner, the wounded honor and the best interests of the country.

Mr. R. said, he held in his hands certain resolutions for that purpose, and, before he offered them to the Senate, he would fully explain his reasons for bringing them forward and pressing them with earnestness, as the best system the United States could now pursue.

It was certainly unnecessary to waste the time of that body in stating that we had a solemn explicit treaty with Spain; that this treaty had been wantonly and unprovokedly violated, not only in what related to the Mississippi, but by the most flagrant, destructive spoliations of our commerce, on every part of the ocean, where Spanish armed vessels met the American flag. These spoliations were of immense magnitude, and demanded the most serious notice of our Government. They had been followed by an indignity and a direct infraction of our treaty relative to the Mississippi, which bore an aspect not to be dissembled or mistaken.

To the free navigation of that river we had an undoubted right from nature, and from the position of our Western country. This right, and the right of deposit in the island of New Orleans, had been solemnly acknowledged and fixed by treaty in 1795. That treaty had been in actual operation and execution for many years; and now, without any pretence of abuse or violation on our part, the officers of the Spanish Government deny the right, refuse the place of deposit, and add the most offensive of all insults, by forbidding us from landing on any part of their territory, and shutting us out as a common nuisance.

By whom has this outrage been offered? By those who have constantly acknowledged our right, and now tell us that they are no longer owners of the country! They have given it away, and, because they have no longer a right themselves, therefore, they turn us out, who have an undoubted right! Such an insult, such unprovoked malignity of conduct, no nation but this would affect to mistake. And yet we not only hesitate as to the course which interest and honor call us to pursue, but we bear it with patience, tameness, and apparent unconcern.

Sir, said Mr. R., whom does this infraction of the treaty and the natural rights of this country most intimately affect? If the wound inflicted on national honor be not sensibly felt by the whole nation, is there not a large portion of your citizens exposed to immediate ruin by a continuance of this state of things? The calamity lights upon all those who live upon the Western waters. More than half a million of your citizens are by this cut off from a market. What would be the language, what would be the feelings of gentlemen in this House, were such an indignity offered on the Atlantic coast? What would they say if the Chesapeake, the Delaware, or the bay of New York were shut up, and all egress prohibited by a foreign Power? And yet none of these waters embrace the interests of so many as the Mississippi. The numbers and the property affected by shutting this river, is greater than anything that could follow by the blockade of a river on the Atlantic coast. Every part of the Union was equally entitled to protection, and no good reason could be offered why one part should be less attended to than another.

In the last year, goods to more than the value of two millions of dollars had been carried into the Western country. These goods were purchased on credit. The consumption of that merchandise afforded a revenue to our Treasury of more than three hundred thousand dollars. The sale of Western public lands was counted upon as producing half a million of dollars annually. Large arrearages of internal taxes were due from that country. The people had just emerged from an Indian war. They had overcome the most frightful obstructions which ever presented themselves in the settlement of a new country, and, although yet in their infancy, we might promise ourselves an honorable and a vigorous manhood, if they were protected, as we had led them to expect; after a little while their strength and faculty of self-preservation would be complete. Certainly they yet needed the kind, fostering hand of their parent States. But if that be now withdrawn, where is the revenue on which to calculate? How can they pay for your lands? How can they discharge the arrearages of taxes? How can they pay your merchants in Baltimore or Philadelphia? They cannot go to market. They have no resources but the produce of their farms. You suffer the Spaniards to lock them up. You tell them that their crops may, nay, must rot on their hands, and yet they must pay their debts and taxes. Is this justice? Will it be submitted to? These men bought your lands in confidence that the Spanish Treaty would be maintained—all sales since the date of the treaty—now you suffer wanton violation of it without making an effort to remove the obstruction, and yet tell them they must pay you! This cannot be expected. It would not be the rule between honorable individuals, for the seller of an estate suffering an eviction of the purchaser, when he might and could prevent it, would not be permitted to recover the purchase money.

If it comports with your calculation of interest or convenience to submit tamely to this outrage, and to witness the ruin of one part of your country for the sake of peace in the residue, surely your ideas of peace will compel you to absolve the Western people from all obligation to repay what it would ruin them to advance. Will you prosecute them in your courts? Will you sell their little all by your public officers? Will you not be content with the loss of all the lively hopes that they had entertained of gaining a new fortune, and another name in the wild but auspicious new countries of the West? Is it not enough that their day is darkening and closing at noon? Surely it cannot be thought reasonable to exact an impossibility. It is undeniable that, in their ruin, many of your merchants on the Atlantic coast will be inevitably involved. Great as this evil may be, (and certainly it is of immense magnitude,) yet the loss of the affections of a people, the destruction of an enterprise of hope, and of industry, through all the Western world, is infinitely greater.

It may be said that this is an overcharged description of the evil side of our affairs, without offering any remedy. Mr. R. said, that was far from his intention, and he would now examine that subject, because to his mind the remedy was obvious.

The experience of all time has proved that with nations, as well as with individuals, submission to aggression and insult, uniformly invites a repetition and aggravation of the mischief. To repel at the onset is more easy, as well as more honorable to the injured party.

Fortunately for this country, there could be no doubt in the present case; our national right had been acknowledged, and solemnly secured by treaty. The treaty had been long in a state of execution. It was violated and denied without provocation or apology. The treaty then was no security. This evident right was one, the security of which ought not to be precarious: it was indispensable that the enjoyment of it should be placed beyond all doubt. He declared it therefore to be his firm and mature opinion, that so important a right would never be secure, while the mouth of the Mississippi was exclusively in the hands of the Spaniards. Caprice and enmity occasion constant interruption. From the very position of our country, from its geographical shape, from motives of complete independence, the command of the navigation of the river ought to be in our hands.

We are now wantonly provoked to take it. Hostility in its most offensive shape has been offered by those who disclaim all right to the soil and the sovereignty of that country—an hostility fatal to the happiness of the Western world. Why not seize then what is so essential to us as a nation? Why not expel the wrongdoers? Wrongdoers by their own confession, to whom by a seizure we are doing no injury. Paper contracts, or treaties, have proved too feeble. Plant yourselves on the river, fortify the banks, invite those who have an interest at stake to defend it; do justice to yourselves when your adversaries deny it; and leave the event to Him who controls the fate of nations.

Why submit to a tardy, uncertain negotiation, as the only means of regaining what you have lost: a negotiation with those who have wronged you; with those who declare they have no right, at the moment they deprive you of yours? When in possession, you will negotiate with more advantage. You will then be in the condition to keep others out. You will be in the actual exercise of jurisdiction over all your claims; your people will have the benefits of a lawful commerce. When your determination is known, you will make an easy and an honorable accommodation with any other claimant. The present possessors have no pretence to complain, for they have no right to the country by their own confession. The Western people will discover that you are making every effort they could desire for their protection. They will ardently support you in the contest, if a contest becomes necessary. Their all will be at stake, and neither their zeal nor their courage need be doubted.

Look at the memorial from the Legislature of the Mississippi Territory, now on your table: that speaks a language and displays a spirit not to be mistaken. Their lives and fortunes are pledged to support you. The same may with equal truth be asserted of Kentucky, Tennessee, and the western people of Virginia and Pennsylvania. Is this a spirit to be repressed or put asleep by negotiation? If you suffer it to be extinguished, can you recall it in the hour of distress, when you want it?

After negotiation shall have failed, after a powerful, ambitious nation shall have taken possession of the key of your western country, and fortified it; after the garrisons are filled by the veterans who have conquered the East, will you have it in your power to awake the generous spirit of that country and dispossess them? No; their confidence in such rulers will be gone; they will be disheartened, divided, and will place no further dependence upon you. They must abandon those who lost the precious moment of seizing, and forever securing their sole hope of subsistence and prosperity; they must then, from necessity, make the best bargain they can with the conqueror.

It may be added, that the possession of the country on the east bank of the Mississippi will give compactness and irresistible strength to the United States; and in all future European wars, we shall be more courted and respected, than we can ever hope to be without it; on that score, therefore, security will be increased by this measure.

Suppose that this course be not now pursued. Let me warn gentlemen how they trifle with the feelings, the hopes and the fears of such a body of men, who inhabit the western waters. Let every honorable man put the question to himself; how would half a million round him be affected by such a calamity, and no prompt measures taken by the Government to redress it? These men have arms in their hands; the same arms with which they proved victorious over their savage neighbors. They have a daring spirit; they have ample means of subsistence; and they have men disposed to lead them on to revenge their wrongs. Are you certain that they will wait the end of negotiation? When they hear that nothing has been done for their immediate relief, they will probably take their resolution and act. Indeed, from all we have heard, there is great reason to believe that they will, or that they may have already taken that resolution.

They know the nature of the obstruction, they know the weakness of the country; they are sure of present success, and they have a bold river to bear them forward to the place of action. They only want a leader to conduct them, and it would be strange, if with such means and such a spirit, a leader should not soon present himself.

Suppose they do go, and do chase away the present oppressors, and that in the end they are overpowered and defeated by a stronger foe than the present feeble possessors. They will never return to you, for you cannot protect them. They will make the best compromise they can with the Power commanding the mouth of the river, who, in effect, has thereby the command of their fortunes. Will such a bargain be of light or trivial moment to the Atlantic States. Bonaparte will then say to you, my French West India colonies, and those of my allies, can be supplied from my colony of Louisiana, with flour, pork, beef, lumber, and any other necessary. These articles can be carried by my own ships, navigated by my own sailors. If you, on the Atlantic coast, wish to trade with my colonies in those articles, you must pay fifteen or twenty per cent. of an impost. We want no further supplies from you, and revenue to France must be the condition of all future intercourse. What will you say to this? It will be vain to address your Western brethren, and complain your commerce is ruined, your revenue dwindles, and your condition is desperate. They will reply that you came not to their assistance in the only moment you could have saved them; that you balanced between national honor and sordid interest, and suffered them to be borne down and subdued, at a time when for a trifle you could have secured the Mississippi; that now their interest must be consulted, and it forbade any assistance to you, when following in the same train of ruin which overwhelmed them. If the evil does not immediately proceed the full length of disunion, yet the strength, the unity of exertion, the union of interest will be gone. We are no longer one people, and representatives from that part of the country in our public councils, will partake of the spirit and breathe the sentiments of a distinct nation; they will rob you of your public lands; they will not submit to taxes; they will form a girdle round the Southern States, which may be denominated a foreign yoke, and render the situation of that country very precarious as to its peace and past connexions. Indeed, every aspect of such a state of things is gloomy and alarming to men who take the trouble of reflecting upon it.

But, sir, said Mr. R., I have heard it suggested that another mode has been contemplated for getting rid of this crisis in our affairs. If we remain perfectly quiet and passive, show no symptoms of uneasiness or discontent; if we give no offence to the new and probable masters of the Mississippi; may be they will sell! To me it is utterly incredible that such an effect would flow from such a conduct. They might possibly sell if they found us armed—in possession, and resolved to maintain it. They would see that even conquest would be a hard bargain, of so distant a country; our possession would be evidence of a fixed resolution. But when we have no army, no military preparation, no semblance of resistance, what would induce them to sell? Sell, sir! for how much? Why sir, although there is no information before this House, of any terms, yet I have seen it stated in the newspapers, that those who now pretend to claim that country may be persuaded to sell, by giving two million of dollars to certain influential persons about the Court—per to debate upon confidential information which, in his opinion, should be kept secret.*

Mr. R. denied that there was any confidential information in that House.

The VICE PRESIDENT said there was no confidential information before the Senate, that he recollected, and that he perceived nothing improper or out of order in what had been said.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he hoped the galleries would be cleared. It appeared to him that the gentleman was about to discuss points of a confidential nature.

Mr. Ross hoped not; and would give his reasons.

Mr. NICHOLAS objected, that it would not be in order for the gentleman to give his reasons.

Mr. Ross.—I will never speak upon this subject, sir, with closed doors. The moment you shut your doors I cease, and when they are opened I will proceed. There is nothing of a secret or confidential nature in what I have to say. Mr. R. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays, upon the question of closing the doors.

Mr. WRIGHT read one of the rules of the Senate, to show that a vote was not necessary for closing the doors.†

Mr. WELLS inquired whether it was in order to interrupt a gentleman while speaking, and to make a motion while he was in possession of the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT thought that in such a case, where a Senator thought that the subject required secrecy, it might be done. The doors must be closed at the request of any Senator, and afterwards the Senate would determine by vote, whether or not the business should proceed with closed doors. He then ordered the galleries and lobby to be cleared. The doors remained closed for some time, when they were again opened, and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 15.

Upon reading the minutes of the preceding day, the following entry was found to have been made by the Secretary:

"Mr. Ross stated in his place, that he had several resolutions to submit to the consideration of the Senate, on the infraction of the treaty by the Government of Spain, in withholding the right from the citizens of the United States to deposit their produce in the Spanish territories; upon which, while he was proceeding in some introductory observations,—

"On motion made and seconded, the galleries were cleared, and the doors were shut."

The above entry on the minutes, Mr. CLINTON, of New York, moved to strike out, and the motion was carried.

A confidential message was brought from the House of Representatives by Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. BAYARD, a committee of that House; which, was read, as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Senate :

"We transmit you a bill, which has passed this House, entitled "An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," and in which we request your concurrence. This bill has been passed by us in order to enable the President of the United States to commence, with more effect, a negotiation with the French and Spanish Governments, relative to the purchase of the island of New Orleans, and the provinces of East and West Florida. The nature and importance of the measures contemplated, have induced us to act upon the subject with closed doors. You will, of consequence, consider this communication as confidential."

The message and two bills accompanying it were read, and ordered to the second reading.

The Message yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was read, as follows:

"Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives :

In obedience to the ordinance for the government of the Territories of the United States, requiring that the laws adopted by the Governor and Judges thereof shall be reported to Congress from time to time, I now transmit those which have been adopted in the Indiana Territory, from January, 1801, to February, 1802, as forwarded to the office of the Secretary of State.

FEB. 14, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Ordered, That the Message and laws therein referred to, be committed to Messrs. ANDERSON, BRECKENRIDGE, and CLINTON, to consider and report thereon.

The bill yesterday brought up from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States,'" was read, and ordered to the second reading.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the motion for the reconsideration of the vote on the passage of the bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington;" and on the question, Will the Senate agree to the reconsideration? it passed in the affirmative; and it was agreed that the consideration of this bill, as in its second reading, should be the order of the day for Friday next.

On motion made and seconded, the galleries were cleared, and the doors of the Senate Chamber closed.

Ordered, That the message and bills just received from the House of Representatives be considered as confidential, and that secrecy be observed by the members and officers of the Senate.

The bill to alter the time of holding the court of the United States for the Kentucky district was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. T. FOSTER, BRECKENRIDGE, and ELLERY, to consider and report thereon.

WEDNESDAY, February 16.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States,'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. T. FOSTER, CLINTON, and STONE, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate took into consideration the amendments reported by the committee to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States,'" and, having agreed thereto,

Ordered, That the bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The bill to revive an act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," was read the third time and amended; and it was agreed that the further consideration thereof should be postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war," and a bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States,'" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last mentioned were read, and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th instant, the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to 'the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen,'" reported amendments, which were read, and agreed to; and Ordered, That the bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The confidential bills brought yesterday from the House of Representatives were severally read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, BRECKENRIDGE, BALDWIN, NICHOLAS, and STONE, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was recommended, on the 11th instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia," reported further amendments; which were read, and it was agreed that this bill should be the order of the day for Wednesday next.

MISSISSIPPI QUESTION.

Mr. ROSS rose and said, that two days ago he had the honor of stating some of his opinions to the Senate, respecting the alarming condition of our affairs upon the Mississippi; that in a very interesting part of his inquiry he had been called to order; that the Vice President had expressly determined him to have been in order, and also declared that there was no confidential information before the Senate relating to the late aggressions upon our rights in Mississippi: yet, notwithstanding this declaration of the Vice President, as explicit as it was correct, Mr. R. said, the doors were actually closed and all further public discussions at that time prohibited. Yesterday the doors were again closed. He said it would be well recollected, that when this extraordinary measure was resorted to, he had given notice that he would not proceed further in the discussion, while the doors were shut, and that he would resume it whenever they should be opened. From that time to the present he had remained silent, but now, when a majority of the Senate had resolved that this discussion should be public, he would proceed to finish the remarks he had intended to make, and then offer his resolutions. He could not, however, avoid expressing his acknowledgments to the majority of that body, who had decided that this debate should be public, for although some gentlemen might be desirous to stifle, and smother in secrecy, an inquiry like the present, he firmly believed that there would always be firmness and independence enough in that House to meet in public the investigation of every subject proper for public deliberation.

Mr. R. said he would not return to a repetition of what he had formerly stated, it would be sufficient to mention, that he had urged the importance of our rights in the navigation of the Mississippi, founded in nature, and acknowledged by compact. This was the great and only highway of commerce from the western country to the ocean. That the Spaniards after a long execution of this treaty, have now flagrantly violated it, and shut us out from all intercourse, and from the right of deposit: that they have plundered our citizens upon the ocean; carried our vessels into their ports, and condemned them without the semblance of a trial. Our seamen have been cast into prison, and our merchants ruined. Thus assailed upon the ocean, and upon the land, by a long course of oppression and hostility, without provocation and without apology, he knew but one course we could take which promised complete redress of our wrongs. Experience had proved the compact was no security; the Spaniards either cannot or will not observe their treaty. If they are under the direction of a stronger Power, who will not permit them to adhere to their stipulations, or if they of their own accord inflict these indignities under a belief that we dare not resent them, it was equally incumbent upon us to act without farther delay. The aggressors are heaping indignity upon you at your own door, at the very borders of your territory, and tell you, at the same time, they have no right to the country from whence they exclude you.

If they act thus without right, why not enforce yours by taking possession? Will you submit to be taken by the neck and kicked out without a struggle? Was there not spirit enough in the country to repel and punish such unheard-of insolence? Is not the magnitude of the interest at stake, such as to warrant the most vigorous and decisive course which can express public indignation? Go then, take the guardianship of your rights upon yourselves, trust it no longer to those who have so grossly abused the power they have had over it; reinstate yourselves in the possession of that which has been wrested from you and withheld by faithless men, who confess themselves no longer the owners of the country over which they are exercising these acts of injustice and outrage. Negotiation may, perhaps, be wise, but this is the effectual measure to support it; when it is seen that you have determined to support your just demands with force, that you have already taken into your hands an ample pledge for future security and good behaviour, your Ambassador will be respected and attended to. But what weight will his remonstrances have in any country of Europe, when they hear of no military preparations to vindicate your pretensions; when they learn that you have been chased out of a possession confessedly your right; that you have been insultingly told, Begone, you shall not buy, you shall not sell, you are such a nuisance we will have no intercourse with you!

Where is the nation, ancient or modern, that has borne such treatment without resentment or resistance? Where is the nation that will respect another that is passive under such humiliating degradation and disgrace? Your outlet to market closed, next they will trample you under foot upon your own territory which borders upon theirs! Yet you will not stir, you will not arm a single man; you will negotiate! Negotiation alone, under such circumstances, must be hopeless. No. Go forward, remove the aggressors, clear away the obstructions, restore your possession with your own hand, and use your sword if resistance be offered. Call upon those who are most injured, to redress themselves; you have only to give the call, you have men enough near to the scene, without sending a man from this side the mountains; force sufficient, and more than sufficient, for a prompt execution of your orders. If money be an object, one half of the money which would be consumed and lost by delay and negotiation, would put you in possession; then you may negotiate whether you shall abandon it and go out again.

You may also then negotiate as to compensation for the spoiliations upon your trade. You will have ample funds in your own hands to pay your merchants, if the Spaniards continue their refusals to pay. You will have lands to give, which they will readily accept and assist in defending. In this way they may all be indemnified; by negotiation there is little hope that they ever will.

It may be said that the Executive is pursuing another and very different course. The Executive will certainly pursue the course designated by the Legislature. To the Congress has been confided the power of deciding what shall be done in all cases of hostility by foreign Powers. There can be no doubt that, by the law of nature and nations, we are clearly authorized to employ force for our redress in such a case as this; that we have a just right to take such measures as will prevent a repetition of the mischief, and afford ample security for the future quiet enjoyment of the violated right. If we leave it entirely to the Executive, he can only employ negotiation, as being the sole means in his power. If the right be not abandoned what is to be done? I know, said Mr. R., that some gentlemen think there is a mode of accomplishing our object, of which, by a most extraordinary proceeding, I am forbidden to speak on this occasion; I will not, therefore, touch it. But I will ask honorable gentlemen, especially those from the Western country, what they will say on their return home to a people pressed by the heavy hand of this calamity, when they inquire, What has been done? What are our hopes? How long will this obstruction continue? You answer: We have provided a remedy, but it is a secret! We are not allowed to speak of it there, much less here; it was only committed to confidential men in whispers, with closed doors; but, by and by, you will see it operate like enchantment; it is a sovereign balsam which will heal your wounded honor; it is a potent spell, or a kind of patent medicine which will extinguish and forever put at rest the devouring spirit which has desolated so many nations of Europe? You never can know exactly what it is; nor can we tell you precisely the time it will begin to operate; but operate it certainly will, and effectually too! You will see strange things by and by; wait patiently, and place full faith in us, for we cannot be mistaken!

This idle tale may amuse children. But the men of that country will not be satisfied. They will tell you that they expected better things of you, that their confidence has been misplaced, and will not wait the operation of your newly invented drugs; they will go and redress themselves.

I say, also, let us go and redress ourselves; you will have the whole nation with you. On no question since the Declaration of Independence, has the nation been so unanimous as upon this. We have at different times suffered great indignity and outrages from different European Powers; but none so palpable, so inexcusable, so provoking, or of such magnitude in their consequences, as this. Upon none has public opinion united so generally as this. It is true we have a lamentable division of political opinion among us, which has produced much mischief, and may produce much greater than any we have yet felt. On this question, party spirit ought to sink and disappear. My opinions are well known, and are not likely to change; but I candidly, and with all possible sincerity, declare my conviction to be clear, that there will not be a dissenting voice in the western country if this course be taken; that so far as my own abilities go, they shall be exerted to the utmost to support it; and I know that my friends on this floor with whom I have long thought and acted, have too high a regard for the national honor, and the best interests of their country, to hesitate a moment giving the same pledge of their honest determination to support and render these measures effectual, if taken: call them ours, if you please, we take the responsibility, and leave the execution of them with you. For, as to myself or my friends, no agency is wished, except that of uniting with you in rousing the spirit, and calling out the resources of the country, to protect itself against serious aggression, and the total subjection and loss of the western country.

If you pursue this advice, and act promptly and boldly upon it; if you take possession, and prepare to maintain it; from the very unanimity displayed, you will have no war—you will meet with no resistance. Indeed, a war may be said to be already begun, for hostility of the worst kind, on one side, has been long in practice upon us, and our retaliation or resistance will be justified on every principle which has governed the conduct of nations. If the Spaniards resist you in taking possession of what by treaty they have acknowledged to be yours, and what they now confess does not belong to them, the war certainly begins with them. Under all these circumstances, with these offers of support, could gentlemen doubt, could they venture to cry peace, peace, when there was no peace, but a sword!

Mr. R. entreated gentlemen to view and consider his proposed resolutions with candor. He declared his intentions to be solely the attainment of an object, the loss of which would destroy the country where he resided, and hazard the Union itself. If gentlemen thought the proposed means inadequate, he would agree to enlarge them with cheerfulness; all that he wished was that effectual means be voted and employed in this golden moment, which, if lost, never would return.

He said he would delay the Senate no longer than to present his resolutions, and give notice that he would move to have them printed, and made the order of the day for some future day; for, as gentlemen had consented that this business should be no longer a secret, they would now become the subject of ample and able discussion.

Mr. R. then read his resolutions, which are as follows:

Resolved, That the United States have an indisputable right to the free navigation of the river Mississippi, and to a convenient place of deposit for their produce and merchandise in the island of New Orleans.

"That the late infraction of such, their unquestionable right, is an aggression hostile to their honor and interest.

"That it does not consist with the dignity or safety of this Union to have a right so important by a tenure so uncertain.

"That it materially concerns such of the American citizens as dwell on the western waters, and is essential to the union, strength, and prosperity of these States, that they obtain complete security for the full and peaceable enjoyment of such their absolute right.

"That the President be authorized to take immediate possession of such place or places, in the said island, or the adjacent territories, as he may deem fit and convenient for the purposes aforesaid; and to adopt such other measures for obtaining that complete security as to him in his wisdom shall seem meet.

"That he be authorized to call into actual service any number of the militia of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, or of the Mississippi Territory, which he may think proper, not exceeding fifty thousand, and to employ them, together with the military and naval forces of the Union, for effecting the objects above mentioned.

"That the sum of five millions of dollars be appropriated to the carrying into effect the foregoing resolutions, and that the whole or any part of that sum be paid or applied, on warrants drawn in pursuance of such directions as the President may, from time to time, think proper to give to the Secretary of the Treasury."

After reading the resolutions, Mr. Ross said, I will now move these resolutions, and if gentlemen on the other side shall be disposed to give to the President greater power, I will cheerfully join them in extending it as far as they may think necessary to the accomplishment of the object.

Mr. WELLS rose and seconded the motion.

Mr. Ross moved that the consideration of the resolutions be the order of the day for Monday.

Mr. NICHOLAS rose and said he wished to make one or two observations in reply to —

The VICE PRESIDENT interrupted him, and said if those observations were intended to apply to the question whether the resolutions should be the order for Monday, they would be proper, otherwise they would not be in order.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he did not wish to go into any discussion of the merits of the resolutions. He merely wished to remark, that the course pursued by the gentleman on this occasion was altogether new and extraordinary. I presume, said he, that the gentleman expects to derive some advantage from the adoption of this course. If so, he is quite welcome to any advantage which he can gain. I believe that the American people are too enlightened and too well informed to be deceived by anything that has been said, or by the novel course which has been pursued. It is usual when any business of such importance is about to be introduced, to give some previous notice, in order that gentlemen may be prepared to discuss the subject. Why the gentleman has thought proper to depart from it in the present instance I cannot pretend to say. However, all that I think important to say at present is in reply to the assertion, that we are not informed of the intention of —

The VICE PRESIDENT again interrupted him, and said that the question before the Senate was, whether the resolution should be the order for Monday. Upon that question, no remarks in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania could be admitted. If gentlemen were disposed to discuss the resolution, or to reply to any arguments which had been advanced by the mover, the regular method would be to negative the motion, and then the whole subject would again be open.

Mr. Ross said he did not wish to preclude any observations which any gentleman might be disposed to make; and if the gentleman from Virginia wished to reply to anything which he had said, he would withdraw the motion, and give him an opportunity.

Mr. NICHOLAS said he had no wish upon the subject, and would say nothing more.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he hoped it would not be the order for Monday, and as the gentleman had been indulged with an opportunity of advancing his sentiments at large upon the subject, he presumed it would be in order for him to notice some of the most extraordinary of —

The VICE PRESIDENT said it would not be in order, unless the present motion was negatived.

The question was then taken, and carried in the affirmative.

ALIENS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. LOGAN presented to the Senate a memorial from certain aliens of the State of Pennsylvania. He remarked, at the time of presenting it, that it contained some expressions not so respectful and decorous as he could wish, considering the situation of the petitioners. He hoped the Senate would decide for themselves, whether it should be received.

Mr. WELLS hoped, that in consequence of what had been stated by the gentleman, and which he considered as very frank and honorable, that the petition would not be received.

Mr. DAYTON said that he could not decide upon the course which had been usual in the Senate upon such occasions, but he knew what was the practice in the other House, and he knew that that practice was Parliamentary, and hoped that it would be adopted on the present occasion. This was, that when anything was offered which was suspected to be improper, the member offering it should read the paper, standing in his place, for the information of the House, and then it should be decided whether it should be received and read from the Clerk's table. He was unwilling to reject the petition without knowing more of it, and therefore hoped that this mode of proceeding would be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated that it was a rule of the Senate, that whenever a petition or memorial was presented, the member presenting it should state in his place the substance of the address, and that the Senate should then decide whether it should be received. This had been done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the question would now be on receiving the petition.

Mr. CLINTON could see no necessity for this formality. He hoped the petition would be read, and the Senate would then be able to decide whether it contained anything improper.

Mr. JACKSON wished it to be read. He was not afraid of anything contained in the petition. He knew it had been usual to receive the petitions of citizens, and to hear what they had to say. It was not long since the other House had to sit and hear a long memorial from one of the late officers of the Government, (Mr. McHenry,) abusing, in the most pointed terms, a number of the members of that House.

7th CON. 2d SES.—4

Mr. WRIGHT thought it not in order to refer to anything which had taken place in the other House, but he knew that the memorial referred to was of a most abusive —

[The VICE PRESIDENT interrupted him, by reminding him that he was quite correct when he remarked that it was not in order to refer to transactions which had taken place in the other House.]

Mr. MORRIS expressed his satisfaction at having an opportunity to express his sentiments upon the subject. He had not seen the petition, though he understood it had been published in the newspapers. But he would embrace the opportunity, as he had but a few days to remain in the Senate, and that in a minority, of cautioning gentlemen to beware of suffering improper and indecent representations to be made to them. He thought the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON) to be quite correct, and as the gentleman from Pennsylvania had intimated that the address was wanting in decorum he hoped that mode would be adopted. If the example were set of receiving papers without investigating their contents, the Senate would be exposed to be pelted by every person who can write. He concluded by begging gentlemen to take proper care, in season, to put a shield before their own dignity.

Mr. LOGAN said, if there had been anything in the paper insulting to the Senate, he should not have presented it. There were some expressions respecting the Government of the country, particularly the last Administration, which he thought not so respectful as they ought to be. They were, however, far less indecent than what appeared every day in the public prints against every department of the Government. If we do not respect ourselves so much as to prevent these things in our own citizens, he did not see how it could be expected that foreigners would respect us.

The VICE PRESIDENT said that he knew of but one course to be pursued in cases of the kind, and that was the course prescribed by the rule, which was, that the substance of the petition should be stated by the Senator presenting it. If this statement were not sufficiently full, he might be called upon to explain further.

Mr. DAYTON said, if he had not a right to call up the gentleman to read it in his place, he would withdraw his opposition, and take it upon the word of the gentleman who offered it, in whom he had the most implicit confidence. He had before understood that the petition was indecent. It was now stated to be merely not sufficiently respectful.

Mr. MORRIS said the subject now appeared with a very different aspect. He had no objection to the reading.

Mr. NICHOLAS knew that it was the custom in the other House, in cases like the present, for the member offering the petition to read it in his place. He wished it had been the custom in the Senate. By what had been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, there must be something in the memorial not altogether proper. When a gentleman would rise in his place, and frankly state that he had a petition containing indecent expressions, he then divested himself of all responsibility. If the Senate receive the petition they receive it at their own risk. For this reason he was not willing that this petition should be received and read without knowing something more of the contents.

Mr. ANDERSON wished the gentleman would read that part which he deemed exceptionable.

Mr. JACKSON said that would be receiving all the bad and rejecting the good.

Mr. WHITE wished that at least the exceptionable part might be explicitly stated, otherwise he could not determine in what manner to give his vote.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought that no person was bound to receive insulting communications. Either an individual, a family, or a Legislative body, has a right to refuse to receive a letter or message couched in indecent terms. He would be glad to know, if he could come at the information, how far the present petition was of that description. If the language was indecent, he would not receive it, let there be ever so much good in the memorial. There would be no hardship to the petitioners, as they could take it back and couch it in proper terms, and then it would be received.

Mr. JACKSON did not know what right the gentleman last up had to assume to himself the whole care of the dignity of the Senate. He knew, that as Governor of Georgia, he had been obliged to submit to many insults. He had often received anonymous communications of an insulting kind, and supposed that other men in public stations had experienced the same. He believed it to be a custom daily practised upon, and no man could tell, till he read the communications, whether they were insulting or not. He was not afraid that any slander contained in the memorial would attach to the Senate. He believed it would wash itself off as fast as it could be poured on.

Mr. BALDWIN would rather see the petition in the hands of the gentleman who offered it before acting upon it. He, therefore, moved that the further consideration of the question be postponed until to-morrow, that the Senators might have an opportunity of judging for themselves.

Mr. COCKE.—Mr. President, I am against the postponement, and for this reason, that I am willing to hear the petition, and after hearing it, we can then judge about treating of it as it deserves, and I am against closing our ears against any citizens who have a desire of addressing us.

The question was taken, and the further consideration of the question was postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 17.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory," and in obedience to the provisions of the act, supplemental to the last mentioned act, on the claims made by settlers, and other persons, to lands within the territory situate west of the river Chatahoochee, and south of the cession made to the United States by South Carolina; and the report was read.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

FRIDAY, February 18.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 14th instant, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Moses White," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That the consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Corp," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, TRACY, and BRADLEY, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, where by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. STONE, JACKSON, and SUMTER, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States," and to the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ELLERY, CLINTON, and J. MASON, to consider and report thereon.

On motion, it was agreed, that the order of the day on the bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington," be postponed until Wednesday next.

The bill, entitled "An act to provide an additional armament for the protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for continuing in force a law, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read and ordered to the second reading.

MONDAY, February 21.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of THEODORUS BAILEY, appointed a Senator by the State of New York, to take his seat after the third day of March next; which were read, and ordered to lie on file.

Mr. STONE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 18th instant, the bill, entitled "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited," reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the committee appointed the 28th of January last, on the petition of Christian Vangundy, be discharged.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred on the 27th of December last, the petition of the inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory holding lands under Spanish grants and occupancy, obtained prior to the ratification of the treaty between the United States and Spain, be discharged.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the petition of Stephen Sayre, be discharged.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee appointed on the 8th instant on that subject, reported a bill to amend the acts providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio and above the mouth of Kentucky river, which was read, and ordered to the second reading.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th instant, the petition of Robert Ross and others, inhabitants of the county of Fairfield, in the State of Ohio, purchasers of certain lands of the United States, praying remission of the interest on the purchase-money, reported that, in the opinion of the committee, the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted; and the report was adopted.

The bill, entitled "An act for continuing in force a law, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" was read the second time.

On motion, it was agreed that sundry resolutions on the right of the United States to the free navigation of the Mississippi (the order of this day) should be postponed until Wednesday next.*

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and three;" and a bill, entitled "An act concerning the insurance of buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills were read, and ordered to the second reading.

Agreeably to notice given on the 17th instant, Mr. BRECKENRIDGE had leave to bring in a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" and also the act supplementary thereto, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" which was read, and ordered to the second reading.

In Executive session, Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 16th instant, the confidential bills sent up from the House of Representatives, reported that they severally pass without amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," was resumed.

On motion to amend the bill, and to strike out the words, "of defraying any extraordinary ex-

BRECKENRIDGE, STONE, and BALDWIN, to consider and report thereon.

Agreeably to notice, yesterday given, Mr. WRIGHT had leave to bring in a bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress; which was read, and ordered to the second reading.

MISSISSIPPI QUESTION.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate took into consideration the resolutions submitted on the 16th instant, respecting the indisputable right of the United States to the free navigation of the river Mississippi. Whereupon,

The VICE PRESIDENT rose, and stated that he conceived it to be his duty to point out to the Senate a contradiction which appeared in their rules. The Standing Rules of the House declare that, during the debate, "the doors shall be open;" by the 28th rule of the House it is declared that, "on motion made and seconded, the gallery shall be cleared, and the doors remain shut during the discussion." Between these two rules there was an embarrassing contradiction. He did not see the propriety of leaving it in the power of any two members to shut the doors, but as it lay in the discretion of the House to regulate its own proceedings, he would submit it to the House in the form of a specific proposition; and he hoped the House would decide upon it without debate. The following is the proposition:

"If during the debate, or any other time, a motion be made and seconded to shut the doors, should the galleries forthwith be cleared, and the doors shut without debate or question?"

Mr. COCKE said, if he understood the President right, he expected the Senate to decide upon this proposition without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT replied in the affirmative.

Mr. COCKE said that he would not submit to give his vote, without the expression of his opinion, if he thought it proper, as well as the Vice President.

Mr. NICHOLAS.—The officer, whoever he may be, that is appointed to expound the laws of that House, ought not, he has no right to go into a discussion of the propriety or impropriety of any rules laid down in the Senate—it was not orderly to do so. There can be no question on a rule at this time or in this form, and it amounts to a questioning of a right established, whether any member has, or has not a right to do as is enjoined by the rules. It cannot be denied that any member, on motion made and seconded, may have the galleries cleared and the doors shut, if he thinks the occasion calls for it.

Mr. DAYTON.—Does the gentleman from Virginia mean to say that, that or any other rule can give a member the right of seating me in the midst of a discussion? If I act disorderly, the President has a right to call me to order, and he must decide whether I am in order or not. There is nothing in your rules which gives a member a right to seize upon the floor.

Mr. TRACY was of opinion, that the 28th rule carried the meaning which it expressed; it was clear, that if he had a question to propose which required closed doors, he had a right to call for the doors being shut; but certainly the rule never contemplated that in so doing the floor should be seized upon in the midst of a speech or a debate. By the 16th rule, when a member is called to order, he is obliged to sit down. According to parliamentary proceeding, no one can take possession of the floor to the interruption of another, no one can stop another while he is speaking. If disorderly, the President will call him to order, but if called by a member, the President must decide, and if in order, he must possess the floor. If any other course were pursued, the House would be constantly exposed to interruption by the petulance of any two of its members.

Mr. BALDWIN.—Gentlemen appear to mistake the principle of the rules in question, and the course of proceeding generally appears not to be kept perfectly in sight. Certainly the House subject to interruption by other causes than points of order; an incident occurs almost every day, in which members are obliged to be seated in the midst of debate, such as messages from the Executive, or from the other House. He had always entertained a very different opinion from that expressed by some gentlemen of the 28th rule. It was true it had the aspect of placing the House at the power of an individual. But if gentlemen would recur to the mode of proceeding which existed before, they would find that this was not an improper rule. For some time the proceedings of the Senate were altogether with closed doors, but this was not approved by the public, it was not wholesome, and after mature deliberation, it was determined that the doors should be opened sub modo, but that when there should appear to be reasonable occasion for shutting the doors, that it should be effected in the mode pointed out by the 28th rule. For it was considered that the mover and seconder of the motion, being of that body, would be sufficient pledges for a reasonable motive, and the Senate would afterwards have it in their power to determine upon the propriety of the motion itself, or to remove any injunction of secrecy, if they should think it proper so to do.

Mr. TRACY said, that the case of a message was not analogous, as the member could rise after it, and continue his speech.

Mr. COCKE said, that the rule was certainly the most correct mode of proceeding; for example, if a member attempts to speak with open doors on confidential business, and a member calls him to order, the very calling to order discloses what the confidential business is. Besides, in the other House there is an appeal from the decision of the Chair; here it is arbitrary, and the President may decide as he pleases.

The VICE PRESIDENT had wished for a decision on this subject on various occasions, and looked to the House for it at this time.

Mr. ROSS, in order to close the discussion, would move a rule for the present occasion—and it will put an end to this delay, and not leave the House at the mercy of any two members—it is to this effect: Resolved, that the discussion of this day shall be public.

Mr. COCKE.—The object of gentlemen is plain enough, they wish to impose an opinion upon the public, that we are afraid or ashamed to let what we are doing be known to the people. Gentlemen would find themselves mistaken in their designs. He was always for the open and public discussion of all subjects, and for none more than the subject of the gentleman's resolutions; but he was opposed to the disclosure of anything which might prove injurious to the country, by retarding or throwing difficulties in the way of negotiations set on foot by the Executive. Gentlemen wished to treat the people like little children, to hold out a scarecrow or a bugbear to frighten them. But they would find that the people were not to be driven from their sober senses. He came from a part of the country which was greatly interested in this subject; and he knew the people were not such fools as the gentleman would make them; they will not believe that those who know them, and have taken the most effectual measures to procure safety and security for them, are plotting evil for them.

Mr. WRIGHT would move an amendment to the resolution, (of Mr. ROSS,) that no member, during debate, shall directly or indirectly disclose the secrets of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT wished to have the precise question resolved—whether two gentlemen have a right, at their pleasure, to close the doors of the Senate?

Mr. ANDERSON.—Does the President mean, by again urging this question in this way, to suspend the resolution and the amendment just offered? He hoped not.

The resolution and amendment were then put, and carried in the affirmative.

The VICE PRESIDENT then read Mr. ROSS's original resolutions. (See ante, p. 95.) Whereupon,

Mr. WHITE, of Delaware, rose and addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. President, on this subject, which has on a former day been discussed with so much ability, and with so much eloquence, by my friend from Pennsylvania, the honorable mover of the resolutions, I shall submit the few observations that I may make, in as concise a manner as I am capable of; for it is very far from my wish to occupy the time or attention of the Senate unnecessarily. The resolutions on your table I approve of in their full extent; I believe they express the firm and manly tone that at this moment is especially becoming the dignity of the Government to assume; I believe they mark out a system of measures, which, if promptly pursued, will be honorable to the nation, and equal to the accomplishment of the important object which gentlemen on all sides seem to have in view. These alone, with me, would be sufficient inducements to yield them my feeble support; but in addition to these, and to the thorough conviction of my own mind as to the course I ought to pursue, I have the happiness of being supported in my opinions on this subject by the unequivocal expression of the sentiment of the State to which I have the honor to belong.

It was early seen, Mr. President, and required but little penetration to discover, that adventurers emigrating beyond the mountains, and settling on Western waters, must possess the free navigation of the Mississippi, it being their only outlet to the ocean. This important privilege it became necessary on the part of the Government of the United States to secure by treaty, and not leave to the capricious will of whatever nation who might in future hold the territory at the mouth of the river. Accordingly, in the 4th and 23d articles of our Treaty with Spain, I find on this subject the following stipulation:

"ART. 4. It is likewise agreed that the western boundary of the United States, which separates them from the Spanish colony of Louisiana, is in the middle of the channel or bed of the river Mississippi, from the northern boundary of the said States to the completion of the 31st degree of latitude north of the equator. And His Catholic Majesty has likewise agreed that the navigation of the said river, in its whole breadth from its source to the ocean, shall be free only to his subjects and the citizens of the United States, unless he should extend this privilege to the subjects of other Powers by special convention."

"ART. 22. The two high contracting parties, hoping that the good correspondence and friendship which happily reigns between them will be further increased by this treaty, and that it will contribute to augment their prosperity and opulence, will in future give to their mutual commerce all the extension and favor which the advantages of both countries may require.

"And in consequence of the stipulations contained in the 4th article, His Majesty will permit the citizens of the United States, for the space of three years from this time, to deposit their merchandise and effects in the port of New Orleans, and to export them from thence without paying any other duty than a fair price for the hire of the stores; and His Majesty promises either to continue this permission, if he finds, during that time, that it is not prejudicial to the interests of Spain, or if he should not agree to continue it there, he will assign to them, on another part of the banks of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment."

Mississippi Question.

SENATE.

This instrument, Mr. President, it is known, for a time, quieted the fears and jealousies of our Western brethren; they supposed it had removed forever the possibility of any future embarrassment to their commerce on those waters. And after it had been proclaimed as the law of the land—after it had been ratified by both nations, and become obligatory upon the faith and honor of each, who could have thought otherwise? Yet, sir, it has happened otherwise. This place of deposit at New Orleans, secured to our citizens by the article last read, has been recently wrested from their hands by the authority of the Spanish Government, and no other equivalent one assigned, where, after more than two thousand miles of boat navigation, they may disembark their produce in order to be shipped for sea; and without this advantage the navigation of the river is to them but an empty name.

I have said, by the authority of the Spanish Government, it has indeed been given out to the world, for reasons that every man may conjecture, and are unnecessary to be mentioned, that this was not the act of the Government, but the rash measure of a single officer—the Intendant General of the Spanish provinces; that the Spanish Minister had issued orders for the speedy adjustment of these difficulties; had kindly offered to throw himself into the breach to prevent this Intendant General from going to extremities with the Government of the United States. Sir, gentlemen may find, when too late, that this is a mere piece of diplomatic policy, intended only to amuse them; and to say nothing of the humiliating idea of resorting to such a plaster for the wound that has been inflicted upon our national honor, if they had taken the trouble, they might have been informed that the Spanish Minister near this Government has no control at New Orleans; that the Intendant General is, like himself, an immediate officer of the Crown, and responsible only to the Crown for his conduct. If the Spanish Minister has interfered, which I am not disposed to question, to make the best of it, it could only have been by the entreaties of men in power, as a mere mediator, to beg of the Intendant General of New Orleans justice and peace on behalf of the people of the United States. Are honorable gentlemen prepared to accept peace on such terms? They might do, sir, for a tribe of starving Indians; but is this the rank that we are to hold among the nations of the world? And it seems that even these supplicating advances are likely to avail us nothing. By accounts very lately received from New Orleans, by a private letter which I have seen since these resolutions were submitted to the Senate, the Intendant General has expressed much displeasure at the interference of the Spanish Minister, stating that it was not within his duty or his province, and that he, the Intendant, acted not under Spanish but French orders.

As to the closing of the port of New Orleans against our citizens, the man who can now doubt, after viewing all the accompanying circumstances, that it was the deliberate act of the Spanish or French Government, must have locked up his mind against truth and conviction, and be determined to discredit even the evidence of his own senses. But, sir, it is not only the depriving us of our right of deposit by which we have been aggrieved, it is by a system of measures pursued antecedent and subsequent to that event, equally hostile and even more insulting. I have in my hand a paper, signed by a Spanish officer, which, with the indulgence of the Chair, I will read to the Senate:

ADVERTISEMENT.—Under date of the 16th instant, (December,) the Intendant General of these provinces tells me that the citizens of the United States of America can have no commerce with His Majesty's subjects—they only having the free navigation of the river for the exportation of the fruits and produce of their establishments to foreign countries, and the importation of what they may want from them. As such I charge you, so far as respects you, to be zealous and vigilant, with particular care, that the inhabitants neither purchase or sell anything to the shipping, flat-bottomed boats, barges, or any other smaller vessels that may go along the river, destined for the American possessions, or proceeding from them, that they shall be informed of it, for their due compliance of the same.

CARLOS DE GRANDPREE.

BATON ROUGE, Dec. 22, 1802.

The foregoing is a translation from the original, dictated to me by his Lordship, Carlos de Grandpree, Colonel of the Royal Armies, and Governor of Baton Rouge.

J. O. CONNER,

BATON ROUGE, Dec. 27, 1802.

These are the measures, Mr. President, that have been adopted; these are the orders that have been issued by the Intendant General to every district of the Spanish provinces, prohibiting the subjects of His Catholic Majesty from having any commerce, dealing, intercourse, or communion whatsoever with the citizens of the United States; excluding us from their shores for the distance of two hundred and seventy miles; treating us like a nation of pirates, or a banditti of robbers, who they feared to trust in their country. And this day, sir, if a vessel belonging to a citizen of the United States, engaged in a fair and legal trade, was upon the waters of the Mississippi, within the Spanish lines, and in a state of the most extreme distress, the Spaniard who should yield her aid or comfort would do it at the peril of his life.

But why do we confine ourselves to the Mississippi? Almost every part of the world furnishes us with causes of complaint against the Spaniards; scarcely a mail has arrived for a year past that has not brought us some account of their outrages upon our commerce. They insult our national flag upon every sea where they meet it; they seize our merchantmen; they plunder our merchants of their property; they abuse our seamen; shackle them with chains, and consign them to dungeons; and yet honorable gentlemen cry out peace, peace, when there is no peace. If this be peace, God give us war! And pray, Mr. President, what have we done to provoke all this? We have violated no treaty with His Catholic Majesty we have injured none of his subjects, we have depredated no where upon his commerce; rather than offend him, when he has smitten us on one cheek, with Christian meekness we have turned the other; he has made no complaint against us; he has no cause of complaint; he does not even condescend to seek a justification for his conduct—none could be found; but it originates in a deliberately formed system of insult and abuse, and he is proceeding, step by step, to ascertain how long the people of the United States will suffer themselves to be trampled upon with impunity. We have seen him on our lines, wantonly infract his solemn treaty; and his subjects are at this moment, under our very eyes, acting in open violation of its best provisions, by withholding from our citizens the all-important right it guaranties to them of navigating freely the Mississippi—a right essential to their very existence as a people—a right that can never be abandoned by them but with their lives; nor yielded by us but with our national honor.

If it should be said, sir, that this important question will not long be an affair of controversy between the United States and Spain; that Louisiana, New Orleans, and this usurped claim of the Spanish Government to the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, will soon be found in other hands; that whenever we may have to negotiate on this subject, either in the cabinet or the field, it will not be with His Catholic Majesty, but with the First Consul; not with a King, but with the King of Kings—I answer that in these insults to our national dignity, we at present know no Power but Spain. Whatever agency Bonaparte may have had in this business, he has been concealed from our view. It is Spain that has violated her plighted faith; it is Spain that has trampled upon the dearest interests of the United States, and insulted our Government to our faces without the semblance of a cause, and she alone is responsible to us for these outrages. And, under such circumstances, is it becoming, politic, or honorable in us to treat her as a friend and as a neighbor; to remonstrate with her on her acts of injustice, and wait till she shall add insult to insult, and heap injury upon injury; or what is perhaps even worse, if any thing worse than national degradation can befall an independent people, till this golden opportunity shall have passed away, and the facility of redress be wrested from our hands? No, sir, we should now view her as our open enemy, as having declared war against us, and do justice to ourselves. We can never have permanent peace on our Western waters, till we possess ourselves of New Orleans, and such other positions as may be necessary to give us the complete and absolute command of the navigation of the Mississippi. We have now such an opportunity of accomplishing this important object as may not be presented again in centuries, and every justification that could be wished for availing ourselves of the opportunity. Spain has dared us to the trial, and now bids us defiance; she is yet in possession of that country; it is at this moment within your reach and within your power; it offers a sure and easy conquest: we should have to encounter there now only a weak, inactive, and unenterprising people; but how may a few months vary this scene, and darken our prospects! Though not officially informed, we know that the Spanish provinces on the Mississippi have been ceded to the French, and that they will as soon as possible take possession of them. What may we then expect? When in the last extremity we shall be driven to arms in defence of our indisputable rights where now slumbers on his post with folded arms the sluggish Spaniard, we shall be hailed by the vigilant and alert French grenadier, and in the defenceless garrison that would now surrender at our approach, we shall see unfurled the standards that have waved triumphant in Italy, surrounded by impregnable ramparts, and defended by the disciplined veterans of Egypt.

I am willing, sir, to attribute to honorable gentlemen the best of motives; I am sure they do not wish to involve this country in a war, and God knows, I deprecate its horrors as much as any man; but this business can never be adjusted abroad; it will ultimately have to be settled upon the banks of the Mississippi: and the longer you delay, the more time you waste in tedious negotiations, the greater sacrifices you make to protract a temporary and hollow peace, the greater will be your embarrassments when the war comes on; and it is inevitable, unless honorable gentlemen, opposed to us, are prepared to yield up the best interest and honor of the nation. I believe the only question now in our power to decide, is whether it shall be the bloodless war of a few months, or the carnage of years.

These observations, Mr. President, are urged upon the supposition that it is in the power of the Government to restrain the impetuosity of the western people, and to prevent their doing justice to themselves, which, by the by, I beg to be understood as not believing, but expressly the contrary. They know their own strength; they know the feebleness of the enemy; they know the infinite importance of the stake, and they feel, permit me to say sir, with more than mere sensibility, the insults and injuries they have received; they are now all alive on this subject, and I believe will not submit even for the approaching season, to their present ruinous and humiliating situation. You had as well pretend to dam up the mouth of the Mississippi, and say to its restless waves, ye shall cease here, and never mingle with the ocean, as to expect they will be prevented from descending it. Without the free use of the river, and the necessary advantages of deposit below our line, their fertile country is not worth possession, their produce must be wasted in their fields or rot in their granaries: these are rights not only guarantied to them by treaty, but given to them by the God of nature, and they will enforce them, with or without the authority of the Government; and let me ask, whether it is most dignified for the Government to lead or follow in the path of honor? one it must do, or given up that western country.

But, sir, independent of these considerations, those people have other solid claims upon the

SENATE.

Government for immediate support. Under your auspices, and with the promise of your protection, at the hazard of their lives, they explored and settled a wilderness; the lonely desert they have transformed into cultivated fields, the haunt of the wild beast they have made the seat of science; and where but a few years since was heard only the savage yell, their industry and enterprise have reared towns and villages, and planted polished societies. They are our fellow-citizens, our friends, and our brothers, and we are bound by every obligation of good faith, and every sentiment of honor, not to abandon them for a moment. It is now in our power, without difficulty or danger, to redress their wrongs, and to remove forever the possibility of like indignities to the nation. But, Mr. President, let Bonaparte once take quiet possession of the mouth of the Mississippi, and we shall have a war indeed; nothing but the length of our swords, and the best blood of our citizens, will ever make it ours; his object is universal dominion: and the hero of Italy, the military despot of France, a man whose towering ambition bestrides the world, whose will is now the law of nations, with fifty millions of people, and the resources of Europe at his command, will be a foe not easily vanquished; and I repeat sir, let him only set his foot on that shore, let him but plant a single standard there, and he will never yield it but by inches, to superior force. He knows well the value of the position; he knows that it must become one of the first in the world, and that it now offers higher temptations to a powerful, ambitious, and intriguing people than any place on earth. It is the only key to the immense regions watered by the Mississippi and its tributary streams, to a country, larger in extent than all Europe, surpassed by no portion of the world in fertility of soil, and most of it, in climate, a paradise.

But, Mr. President, what is more than all to be dreaded, in such hands, it may be made the means of access and corruption to your national councils and a key to your Treasury. Your Western people will see in Bonaparte, at their very doors, a powerful friend or a dangerous enemy; and should he, after obtaining complete control over the navigation of the Mississippi, approach them, not in the menacing attitude of an enemy, but under the specious garb of a protector and a friend; should he, instead of embarrassing their commerce by any fiscal arrangements, invite them to the free navigation of the river, and give them privileges in trade not heretofore enjoyed; should he, instead of attempting to coerce them to his measures, contrary to their wishes, send missionaries into their country to court and intrigue with them, he may seduce their affections, and thus accomplish by address and cunning, what even his force might not be equal to. In this way, having operated upon their passions, having enlisted in his service their hopes and their fears, he may gain an undue ascendancy over them. Should these things be effected, which God forbid—but Bonaparte in a few years has done much more—what, let me ask honorable gentlemen will be the consequences? I fear even to look them in the face. The degraded countries of Europe, that have been enslaved by the divisions and distractions of their councils, produced by similar means, afford us melancholy examples. Foreign influence will gain admittance to your national councils; the First Consul, or his interests will be represented in the Congress of the United States; this floor may become the theatre of sedition and intrigue. You will have a French faction in the Government, and that faction will increase, with the rapidly increasing population of the western world. Whenever this period shall arrive, it will be the crisis of American glory, and must result, either in the political subjugation of the Atlantic States, or in their separation from the western country; and I am sure there is no American who does not view as one of the greatest evils that could befall us, the dismemberment of this Union. Honorable gentlemen may wrap themselves up in their present imaginary security, and say that these things are afar off, or that they can never happen; but let me beseech of them to look well to the measures they are now pursuing, for, on the wisdom, the promptness, and energy of those measures, will depend whether they shall happen or not. And let me tell them, sir, that the want of firmness or judgment in the cabinet, will be no apology for the disgrace and ruin of the nation.

A single moment more, Mr. President, till I call to the recollection of gentlemen the language of experience, and endeavor to impress upon their minds yet stronger, the importance of the resolutions on your table. One of the first statesmen of the age we live in, the celebrated Mr. Fox, in a most learned and eloquent speech lately delivered in the House of Commons, taking an extended view of the affairs of Europe, and of the particular situation of the British Empire, explicitly declares, that he considers the preservation of national honor to be almost the only legitimate cause of war; that he holds that doctrine upon the plain principle, that honor is directly and inseparably connected with self-defence; and if, says he, it can be proved, that the national honor has been insulted, or the national dignity disgraced, it is a fair and legitimate cause of recommencing hostilities. These, sir, are the noble sentiments of a man, who, for more than thirty years past, has supported one of the most conspicuous characters on the great political theatre of nations; who has, during that time, been unceasingly the favorite of the people, and the zealous advocate of their rights and liberties. They are entitled to weight.

I hope I shall not be charged with a want of delicacy towards the feelings of honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House, when I say, that there was a time, even in the infancy of our Government, when a soldier and a statesman, the greatest and the best of men, was at the head of the Administration, that the most powerful nation of Europe would not have dared us with such an insult as we have received. I refer to the days of WASHINGTON, days of which he was the distinguished pride and ornament, but days that, alas! are now gone, and he, unhappily for his country, with them, never to return. In those days we were indeed comparatively weak and poor, but a national sentiment and feeling were kept alive, that disdained to submit tamely to insult; and now, sir, when we have grown rich and strong, when our overflowing treasury, our increasing energies and population are the burden of every Executive message, and ministerial communication; when our wealth, our power, and our resources, are the boast of every American, shall we see at our very doors, with meek and philosophic forbearance, the dearest interests of our citizens trampled in the dust, and the dignity of our people insulted by an impotent and now degraded nation; and instead of the commanding tone and manner that becomes a nation of republicans, instead of taking justice in our own hands, and avenging these insults and injuries, shall we stoop to send a Minister abroad to supplicate—for what? For justice; for the restoration of our indisputable rights, of which we have been stripped by violence; there to whisper, at the foot of a throne, our national sensibilities, which we fear even to speak of but in secret at home, lest Castilian pride should be offended? I hope not, sir. I hope energetic measures will be promptly adopted, that this Senate will recommend them, and that we shall not lose an hour in preparing to exert the means which God has given us of enforcing the rights that belong to us by treaty and by nature.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE observed, that he did not mean to wander in the field of declamation, nor, after the example of the honorable gentleman who had preceded him, endeavor to alarm or agitate the public mind; that he should endeavor to strip the subject of all improper coloring, and examine dispassionately the propriety of the measures which the Senate were called upon to sanction. He would be very brief.

What is the true and undisguised state of facts? Early in the session, the House of Representatives were informed, by a communication from the President, of the conduct of the Intendant at New Orleans. This communication stated, that he had taken measures to attempt a restoration of the right which had been violated; and that there were reasons to believe that the conduct of the Intendant was unauthorized by the Court of Spain. Accompanying this message were official papers, in which it appeared that the Governor of New Orleans had strongly opposed the conduct of the Intendant, declared that he was acting without authority in refusing the deposit, and indicated a disposition to oppose openly the proceeding. The Spanish Minister who resides here, also interposed on the occasion, and who stands deservedly high in the confidence of his Government, was clearly of opinion, that the Intendant was acting without authority, and that redress would be given so soon as the competent authority could interpose. From this state of things, and which is the actual state at this moment, what is the course any civilized nation who respects her character or rights, would pursue? There is but one course, which is admitted by writers on the laws of nations, as the proper one; and is thus described by Vattel, in his book, sec. 336, 338:

“A Sovereign ought to show, in all his quarrels, a sincere desire of rendering justice and preserving peace. He is obliged before he takes up arms, and after having taken them up also, to offer equitable conditions, and then alone his arms become just against an obstinate enemy, who refuses to listen to justice or to equity. His own advantage, and that of human society, oblige him to attempt, before he takes up arms, all the pacific methods of obtaining either the reparation of the injury, or a just satisfaction. This moderation, this circumspection, is so much the more proper, and commonly even indispensable, as the action we take for an injury does not always proceed from a design to offend us, and is sometimes a mistake rather than an act of malice: frequently it even happens, that the injury is done by inferior persons, without their sovereign having any share in it; and on these occasions, it is not natural to presume that he would refuse us a just satisfaction.”

This is the course which the President has taken, and in which the House of Representatives have expressed, by their resolution, their confidence.

What are the reasons urged by the gentlemen to induce a different proceeding, an immediate appeal to arms? You prostrate, say the gentlemen, your national honor by negotiating, where there is a direct violation of a treaty! How happens it that our national honor has, at this particular crisis, become so delicate, and that the feelings of certain gentlemen are now so alive to it? Has it been the practice of this Government heretofore to break lances on the spot with any nation who injured or insulted her? Or has not the invariable course been to seek reparation in the first place by negotiation? I ask for an example to the contrary; even under the Administration of WASHINGTON, so much eulogized by the gentlemen last up? Were not the Detroit, and several other forts within our territory, held ten or a dozen years by Great Britain, in direct violation of a treaty? Were not wanton spoliation committed on your commerce by Great Britain, by France, and by Spain, to the amount of very many millions; and all adjusted through the medium of negotiations? Were not your merchants plundered, and your citizens doomed to slavery by Algiers, and still those in power, even WASHINGTON himself, submitted to negotiation, to ransom, and to tribute? Why then do gentlemen, who on those occasions approved of these measures, now despair of negotiation! America has been uniformly successful, at least in settling her differences by treaty.

But the gentleman is afraid that if we do not immediately seize the country, we shall lose the golden opportunity of doing it. Would your national honor be free from imputation by a conduct of such inconsistency and duplicity? A Minister is sent to the offending nation with an olive-branch, for the purpose of an amicable discussion and settlement of differences, and before he has scarcely turned his back, we invade the territories of that nation, with an army of fifty thousand men! Would such conduct comport with the genius and principles of our Republic, whose true interest is peace, and who has hitherto professed to cultivate it with all nations? Would not such a procedure subject us to the just censure of the world, and to the strongest jealousy of those who have possessions near to us? Would such a procedure meet the approbation of even our own citizens, whose lives and fortunes would be risked in the conflict? And would it not be policy inexcusably rash, to plunge this country into war, to effect that which the President not only thinks can be effected, but is now actually in a train of negotiation? If, on the other hand, negotiation should fail, how different will be the ground on which we stand! We stand acquitted by the world, and what is of more consequence, by our own citizens, and our own consciences. But one sentiment will then animate and pervade the whole, and from thenceforth we will take counsel only from our courage.

Mississippi Question.

But to induce us to depart from this proper, this safe, and honorable course of proceeding, which is pursuing by the President, the gentleman from Pennsylvania first, and the gentleman from Delaware again told you, that by such pacific measures you will irritate the western people against you; that they will not be restrained by you, but will either invade the country themselves, or withdraw from the Union and unite with those who will give them what they want. Sir, said Mr. B., I did not expect to hear such language held on this floor. Sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania best knows the temper and views of the western people he represents, but if he meant to extend the imputation to the State I have the honor to represent, I utterly disclaim it. The citizens of Kentucky value too highly their rights and character to endanger the one, or dishonor the other. They deal not, sir, in insurrections. They hold in too sacred regard their federal compact to sport with it. They were among the first to oppose violations of it, and will, I trust, be the last to attempt its dissolution. The time indeed was, when not only irritation but disgust prevailed in that country; when, instead of sending fifty thousand men to seize on Orleans, an attempt was meditated, and a solemn vote taken in Congress to barter away this right for twenty-five years. The time indeed was, when great dissatisfaction prevailed in that country, as to the measures of the General Government; but it never furnished there, whatever it might have done elsewhere, even the germs for treasons or insurrections. The people I have the honor to represent are not accustomed to procure redress in this way. Instead of trampling on the Constitution of their country, they rally round it as the rock of their safety. But, unhappily, these times have passed away. Distrust and dissatisfaction have given place to confidence in, and attachment to those in whom the concerns of the nation are confided. I ask no reliance on my opinion for this fact, but appeal to the memorial of the Legislature of Kentucky to the present Congress, for the truth of this assertion. In this disposition of mind therefore, and from the sound sense and correct views and discernment of their true interest, which the people of Kentucky possess, I have no hesitation in pledging myself, that no such precipitate and unwarranted measures will be taken by them, as predicted by the gentlemen in the opposition.

But he begged leave to ask gentlemen who hold such language, would the Western people, admitting they were to withdraw from the Union, be able to accomplish the object? Could they alone go to war with France and Spain? Could they hold Orleans, were they to take possession of it, without the aid of the United States? Admitting they could hold it, what security would they have for their commerce? A single ship-of-the-line would be able completely to blockade that port. See, also, the Havanna, one of the safest and strongest of the Spanish ports and so situated as to possess every advantage in annoying our commerce. Are the gentlemen, therefore, really serious when they endeavor to persuade us that the Western people are in such a state of fury and mad impatience that they will not wait even a few months to see the fate of a negotiation, and, if unsuccessful, receive the aid of the whole nation, but that they will madly run to the attack without a ship, without a single cannon, without magazines, without money, or preparation of any kind; and, what is worse, without union among themselves; and what is still worse, in face of the laws and Constitution of their country? It is impossible. Such a desperate project could not come to a successful issue; for should they even obtain the right by their own exertions alone, they could not expect long to enjoy it in peace, without descending from that exalted, that enviable rank of one of the independent States of United America, to the degraded, dependent condition of a colonial department of a foreign nation.

Although he thought it incumbent on us, for the reasons he had stated, to try the effect of negotiation, yet, should that fail, he thought it incumbent on us also to be prepared for another resort. He considered this right, and upon a different footing from what we ever enjoyed it, so all-important, so indispensable to the very existence of the Western States, that it was a waste of words and time to attempt to portray the evils which a privation of it would produce; and he rejoiced to find that gentlemen with whom he had not been in the habit of voting on most political subjects so perfectly accord with him, that our precarious tenure of it must be changed. He hoped they were sincere in their declarations. If they were, the only difference between us now is, what are the proper means to obtain this great end? The course pursued by the President was, in his opinion, the only true and dignified course. It is that, and that only, which will certainly attain the object; and is the only one which will tend to unite cordially all parts of the Union. But we ought to be prepared, in case of a failure, instantly to redress ourselves. This, instead of having an evil, would, in his opinion, have a good effect on the negotiation. It would show, that although we are willing amicably to adjust our differences, yet that we are not only resolved on, but prepared for that resort which cannot fail to restore our violated rights. With that view, he would offer the following resolutions, as substitutes for those proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

He moved that the whole of the resolutions be struck out, excepting the word "Resolved," and the following be substituted in their place—after the word "Resolved,"

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby authorized, whenever he shall judge it expedient, to require of the Executives of the several States to take effectual measures to organize, arm, and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, eighty thousand effective militia, officers included.

Resolved, "That the President may, if he judges it expedient, authorize the Executives of the several States to accept, as part of the detachment aforesaid, any corps of volunteers; who shall continue in service for such time, not exceeding — months, and perform such services as shall be prescribed by law.

Resolved, "That — dollars be appropriated for paying and subsisting such part of the troops aforesaid, whose actual service may be wanted, and for defraying such other expenses as, during the recess of Congress, the President may deem necessary for the security of the territory of the United States.

Resolved, "That — dollars be appropriated for erecting, at such place or places on the western waters, as the President may judge most proper, one or more arsenals."

Mr. DAYTON wished to know whether it was in order to introduce the substance of a resolution, though in different words, under the name of an amendment.

Mr. CLINTON.—The extraordinary manner in which the subject now under consideration has been introduced, the extraordinary manner in which it has been treated, and the extraordinary nature of the proposition itself, would justify a latitude and severity of remark, which, however, I am not disposed to indulge upon this occasion. I know that I address myself to a very respectable portion of the collected wisdom and patriotism of my country. I will, therefore, leave the honorable members from Pennsylvania and Delaware (Mr. Ross and Mr. WHITE) in the undisturbed possession of their inflammatory appeals and declamatory effusions; and will manifest a becoming respect for the high authority to which I have the honor to speak, by moving on the ground of argument and fact. To prevent losing myself in so spacious a field, I will consider the subject under three distinct heads:

1. The injuries alleged to have been committed on the part of Spain.

2. The nature, character, and tendency of the remedy proposed.

3. Its justice and policy.

The importance of a free navigation of the Mississippi has been duly appreciated by the Government, and a constant eye has been kept upon it in our negotiations with foreign Powers. An attempt was, indeed, made under the Old Confederation to barter it away for twenty-five years, which, however, was effectually controlled by the good sense and patriotism of the Government. By the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain in 1783, by the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation with her in 1794, and by the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation with Spain, in 1795, the right of a free navigation of the Mississippi is recognised and declared to exist from its source to the ocean, in the citizens of the United States. By the 22d article of the Treaty with Spain, it is declared that, "in consequence of the stipulations contained in the 4th article, His Catholic Majesty will permit the citizens of the United States, for the space of three years from this time, to deposit their merchandise and effects in the port of New Orleans, and to export them from thence without paying any other duty than a fair price for the hire of the stores. And His Majesty promises either to continue this permission, if he finds during that time that it is not prejudicial to the interests of Spain, or, if he should not agree to continue it there, he will assign to them, on another part of the lands of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment." The 22d article granting the right of deposit, is, therefore, founded upon the 4th article recognising the right of free navigation, and is intended to give full and complete efficacy to it. By a proclamation of the Intendant of the Province of Louisiana, dated the 16th of October last, the right of deposit is prohibited. The reason assigned for this daring interdiction is, that the three years for which it was granted having expired, it cannot be continued without an express order from the King of Spain; and at the same time no equivalent establishment is assigned, according to the stipulations of the treaty.

There can be no doubt but that the suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans, and the assignment of another place equally convenient, ought to have been contemporaneous and concurrent; that the conduct of the Intendant is an atrocious infraction of the treaty, and that it aims a deadly blow at the prosperity of the Western States; but it is extremely questionable whether it was authorized by the Government of Spain or not. On this subject I am free to declare that I entertain great doubts, which can only be cleared up by the course of events, or perhaps it will be enveloped in darkness. On the one hand, the terms of the proclamation, indicating a misunderstanding of the treaty, the remonstrances of the Governor of the Province, whose authority does not extend to commercial and fiscal affairs, over which the Intendant has an exclusive control, and the prompt and decided assurances of the Spanish Minister near the United States, would induce a belief, that the act of the Intendant was unauthorized. On the other hand, it cannot readily be believed that this officer would assume such an immense responsibility, and encounter an event so big with important consequences, not only to his country but to himself, without knowing explicitly the intentions of his Government. Such, then, is the true state of the Spanish aggression: an important right had been secured to our citizens by the solemnity of a treaty. This right had been withdrawn by an officer of the Spanish Government, and whether this aggression was directed by it or not, is not as yet known. Other aggressions have indeed been stated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross,) in order to darken the picture, and with the manifest design of exasperating our feelings, inflaming our passions, and prompting an immediate appeal to the sword. That gentleman had mentioned that great and unwarrantable spoliations have been committed upon our commerce by Spain, and that redress is refused. The depredations previous to the treaty of 1795, were satisfactorily provided for in it, and those subsequent are in a favorable train of negotiation and adjustment. If it were permitted to me to draw aside the veil which covers our Executive proceedings, I could establish to the satisfaction of every person present, that the honorable mover has wandered widely from candor and the convictions of his own knowledge, in his representations on this subject. I will at present content myself with giving an unqualified contradiction to his declarations, and do cheerfully appeal to the information within the power of every member of the Senate, for the accuracy of my assertion. I am fully satisfied that the Court of Madrid has not only entertained, but has manifested in her negotiations, every disposition to maintain inviolate the relations of amity with this country. When, therefore, the honorable mover proceeded to state that several of our citizens had been seized and imprisoned by the colonial authorities of Spain, I might ask, whether any Government in the world pretended to protect her citizens in the violation of the laws of other nations? Whether our citizens in the situation he has represented, had not been concerned in illicit trade, and in violating the laws of the Spanish colonies? Instances may have indeed occurred where innocent persons have been unjustly dealt with, and whenever representations to this effect shall be made to our Government, I have no doubt but that ample redress will be instantly demanded and insisted upon. Nothing has been laid before us which can authorize the assertions made on this subject. Whenever such conduct shall be brought home to Spain, and prompt and complete satisfaction denied, I shall then consider it the duty of the Government to vindicate the rights of our citizens at all hazards; and I cannot but congratulate the honorable mover, and the other side of the House, on the resurrection of that ardent zeal in favor of their oppressed countrymen, which has so long and so soundly slept over British and French enormities.

As to the nature, character, and tendency of the remedy proposed, there can be but one opinion. It proposes to enter the country of a foreign nation with a hostile force, and to seize a part of its territory. It is not preceded by a formal declaration, and cannot, therefore come under the denomination of a solemn war, but it partakes of the character of a war not solemn. It answers to the definition of war, by Burlamaqui, "a nation taking up arms with a view to decide a quarrel;" to that given by Vattel, who represents it to be

"that state in which a nation prosecutes its right by force." A state of general hostilities would as necessarily follow as an effect would follow a cause; no nation would submit to the irruption of a hostile army without repelling it by force; the proud Castilian, as described by the gentleman from Delaware, would revolt at the insult; the door of negotiation would be effectually closed, and as the appeal would be to arms in the first instance, so the controversy must be finally decided by the preponderance of force. It would, therefore, not only have impressed me with a more favorable opinion of the honorable mover's candor, but also of his decision and energy as a statesman, if he had spoken out boldly, and declared his real object. War is unquestionably his design—his wish. Why, then, mask his proposition? Why combine it with considerations connected with negotiation? Why not furnish the American people at once with the real and the whole project of himself and his friends? If it is bottomed on patriotism, and dictated by wisdom, it need not shrink from the touch of investigation—it will receive their approving voice, and be supported by all their force. The resolution is then to be considered as a war resolution; in no other light can it be viewed; in no other light ought it to be viewed; and in no other light will it be viewed by the intelligence of the country. In this point of view, I will proceed, said Mr. C., to consider its justice and policy; its conformity with the laws and usage of nations, and the substantial interests of this country.

I shall not attempt to occupy your attention by threadbare declamation upon the evils of war, by painting the calamities it inflicts upon the happiness of individuals, and the prosperity of nations. This terrible scourge of mankind, worse than the famine or pestilence, ought not to be resorted to until every reasonable expedient has been adopted to avert it. When aggressions have been committed by the Sovereign or representatives of the will of a nation, negotiation ought in all cases to be first tried, unless the rights of self-defence demand a contrary course. This is the practice of nations, and is enjoined by the unerring monitor which the God of Nature has planted in every human bosom. What right have the rulers of nations to unsheath the sword of destruction, and to let loose the demon of desolation upon mankind, whenever caprice or pride, ambition or avarice, shall prescribe? And are there no fixed laws founded in the nature of things which ordain bounds to the fell spirit of revenge, the mad fury of domination, and the insatiable thirst of cupidity? Mankind have not only in their individual character, but in their collective capacity as nations, recognised and avowed in their opinions and actions, a system of laws calculated to produce the greatest happiness of the greatest number. And it may be safely asserted, that it is a fundamental article of this code, that a nation ought not to go to war, until it is evident that the injury committed is highly detrimental, and that it emanated from the will of the nation charged with the aggression, either by an express authorization in the first instance, or by a recognition of it when called upon for redress, and a refusal in both cases to give it. A demand of satisfaction ought to precede an appeal to arms, even when the injury is manifestly the act of the Sovereign; and when it is the act of a private individual, it is not imputable to his nation, until its Government is called upon to explain and redress, and refuses; because the evils of war are too heavy and serious to be incurred, without the most urgent necessity; because remonstrance and negotiation have often recalled an offending nation to a sense of justice, and a performance of right; because nations, like individuals, have their paroxysms of passion, and when reflection and reason resume their dominion, will extend that redress to the olive-branch, which their pride will not permit them to grant to the sword; because a nation is a moral person, and as such, is not chargeable with an offence committed by others, or where its will has not been consulted, the unauthorized conduct of individuals being never considered a just ground of hostility, until their Sovereign refuses that reparation for which his right of controlling their actions, and of punishing their misconduct, necessarily renders him responsible. These opinions are sanctioned by the most approved elementary writers on the laws of nations. I shall quote the sentiments of some of them. Vattel says:

"Two things, therefore, are necessary to render it (an offensive war) just. First, a right to be asserted; that is, that a demand made on another nation be important and well grounded: Second, that this reasonable demand cannot be obtained otherwise than by force of arms. Necessity alone warrants the use of force. It is a dangerous and terrible resource. Nature, the common parent of mankind, allows of it only in extremity, and when all others fail. It is doing wrong to a nation to make use of violence against it, before we know whether it be disposed to do us justice, or to refuse it. They who, without trying pacific measures, on the least motive run to arms, sufficiently show that justificative reasons, in their mouths, are only pretences; they eagerly seize the opportunity of indulging their passions, and of gratifying their ambition, under some color of right."

It is subsequently stated by this admired writer, that "it is demonstrated in the foregoing chapter, that to take arms lawfully: 1. That we have a just cause of complaint; 2. That a reasonable satisfaction has been denied us, &c."

Burlamaqui says:

"However just reason we may have to make war, yet as it inevitably brings along with it an incredible number of calamities, and often injustices, it is certain that we ought not to proceed too easily to a dangerous extremity, which may perhaps prove fatal to the conqueror himself. The following are the measures which prudence directs Sovereigns to observe in these circumstances: 1. Supposing the reason of the war is just in itself, yet the dispute ought to be about something of great consequence to us, since it is better even to relinquish part of our right, when the thing is not considerable, than to have recourse to arms to defend it. 2. We ought to have at least some probable appearance of success; for it would be a criminal temer-ity, and a real folly, wantonly to expose ourselves to certain destruction, and to run into a greater, in order to avoid a lesser evil. 3. Lastly, there should be a real necessity for taking up arms; that is, we ought not to have recourse to force, but when we can employ no milder method of recovering our rights, or of defending ourselves from the evils with which we are menaced. These measures are agreeable not only to the principles of prudence, but also to the fundamental maxims of sociability, and the love of peace; maxims of no less force, with respect to nations, than individuals. By these a Sovereign must, therefore, be necessarily directed; even the justice of the Government obliges him to it; in consequence of the very nature and end of authority. For as he ought always to take particular care of the State, and of his subjects, consequently he should not expose them to all the evils with which war is attended, except in the last extremity, and when there is no other expedient left but that of arms."

In addition to these great authorities, permit me to refer severally to the opinions of two more modern writers, Martens and Paley. The former says that all amicable means for redress must be tried in vain before an appeal to arms, unless it is evident that it would be useless to try such means; and the latter is of opinion that the only justifying causes of war are deliberate invasions of right, and maintaining the balance of power. It is not necessary to decide upon the justice of the last observation, because it does not apply to the case before us. But can any man lay his hand upon his heart, and declare that he believes the present case a deliberate invasion of right by the Spanish Government? Can any man say, that it would be fruitless to attempt amicable means of redress, and that the sword alone can restore us to our rights?

The opinions of these celebrated writers are corroborated by the general usage of nations. A demand of redress before the application of force has been almost uniformly practised by the most barbarous, as well as the most civilized nations. Instances indeed may be found to the contrary, but they are to be considered as departures from established usage. The ancient Romans, who were a military nation, and who marched to empire through an ocean of blood, always demanded satisfaction from the offending nation before they proceeded to war, and fixed upon a certain time in which the demand was to be complied with; at the expiration of which, if redress was still withheld, they then endeavored to obtain it by force. It has been the general practice of the civilized nations of Europe to promulge manifestos justificatory of their conduct, in resorting to arms. These manifestos contain a full statement of their wrongs, and almost always declare that they had previously endeavored by negotiation to obtain a friendly adjustment of their complaints. What is this, but a declaration, that the law and the sense of nations demand this course? What is it, but an appeal to the intuitive sense of right and wrong which exists in every human bosom? The reign of the present King of Great Britain has been emphatically a war reign. In 1760 he ascended the throne, and found the nation at war with France; besides his wars in the East and West Indies, about half of his reign has been consumed in wars with this country and some of the nations of Europe. He has been three times at war with France, three times with Spain, twice with Holland, and once with the United States. The most strange events—events which have pleased and dazzled, astonished and terrified mankind—have passed upon the theatre of the world in his time. The ordinary maxims of policy, and the cardinal principles of action, have been reversed and prostrated. The world has seen the revival of the Crusades, all the great Powers of Europe in arms, and a destroying and desolating spirit go forth, unknown to past times. Portentous as this reign has been, when a deviation from the established laws of nations might naturally be expected, and degraded as the power and condition of Spain is represented to be, I am willing to stake the whole controversy upon the reciprocal conduct of these Governments to each other. Of all wars, one with Spain is the most popular in England, from the opportunities it affords for maritime spoliation, and lucrative enterprise—for the same reasons it is anxiously deprecated by Spain; and it has even grown into a Spanish proverb, "Peace with England, and war with the world." Notwithstanding the preponderating force of Great Britain, the allurements of popularity and cupidity, her great and extraordinary acquisition of maritime power, and the martial temper which has marked her character during the present reign, we find the very Power with which we are now called upon to measure swords, meeting her propositions for negotiation or arms on the ground of perfect equality; maintaining a steady posture, and an erect attitude, passing through her collision with unspotted reputation and unsullied dignity, and teaching us an instructive lesson, that while we ought never to bend into degrading compliances, we are not to expect that a nation which has not yielded improperly to the Power in the world most able to injure her, will tamely submit to the insulting and imperious measure recommended so earnestly to our adoption. Six controversies have occurred between Great Britain and Spain, during the reign of the present King; three have been terminated amicably by negotiation, and three have resulted in war. In 1761, when Great Britain was at war with France, a memorial was presented by the French Ambassador at London, to the English Minister, which implicated some demands of Spain upon Great Britain, and which gave great offence to her Ministry. A negotiation took place, which being attended with an insolent demand for a sight of a treaty concluded between France and Spain, and which being very properly refused, a war ensued. Notwithstanding the conduct of Great Britain in the course of this transaction was precipitate and unjust, negotiation was attempted before an appeal to arms. And the future disclosure of the real transaction furnished her with a salutary lesson; for it was afterwards found that the treaty did not refer to the existing state of the belligerent Powers, but that the guarantee it contained was not to operate until the termination of the war.

In the year 1770 the remarkable case of the Falkland Islands occurred. Six years before, a settlement was made and a fort erected by the British Government on one of them, with a view to accommodate navigators in refitting their ships and furnishing them with necessaries previous to their passage through the Straits of Magellan, or the doubling of Cape Horn. This settlement gave great umbrage to Spain, not only upon account of its interference with her claim of sovereignty to almost the whole Southern Continent of America, and the adjacent islands, but also on account of the facility it would afford, in case of a future war, to an attack upon her South-Sea territories. Ineffectual remonstrances were made on the part of Spain, and, at last, notwithstanding the claim of Great Britain by discovery and occupancy, an armed force was sent—the fort was taken—the settlement was broken up, and the honor of the British flag violated by the taking off of the rudder of a King's ship, and detaining it on shore twenty days. What course did the British pursue on this occasion? In this case the insult was flagrant—the honor of their flag, the dignity of the Crown, and the commerce of the nation, were implicated. Was the sword immediately unsheathed, and the door to peace effectually closed? No. Negotiations ensued—a convention was formed—Spain disavowed the violence and engaged to restore the possessions, but with an express declaration that the restitution should not affect the question concerning the prior right of sovereignty. The islands were also evacuated three years afterwards by Great Britain, in consequence of a secret agreement.

In 1779 Spain declared war against Great Britain, alleging unredressed depredations on her commerce, and that she was insulted in an attempt to negotiate between France and Great Britain. It is evident that this step on the part of Spain was in pursuance of the family compact, and was not justifiable by the law of nations. It appears, however, that previous to taking this measure, she had attempted to attain her objects by negotiation.

In 1786 the long disputes respecting the English settlements on the Mosquito shore, and the coast of Honduras, were settled by negotiation. The English abandoned their Mosquito settlements, and many hundreds of families who had inhabited them under the protection and faith of the British Government, were peremptorily compelled to evacuate that country. The boundaries of the English Honduras settlements were enlarged, but in such a manner as to leave Spain in full possession of her territorial rights and exclusive dominion.

In 1790 the controversy about Nootka Sound arose—two years before, a settlement was made there by an association of British merchants, on land purchased from the natives, with a view to carry on the fur trade. This interfering with the chimerical rights of Spain, a Spanish frigate was despatched by the Viceroy of Mexico, which seized the fort, and captured the English vessels trading there; a negotiation took place, the vessels were restored, and the settlements agreed to be yielded back—but there was an express reservation on the part of Spain, of the right of sovereignty, for ulterior discussion.

In 1796, Spain, in pursuance of a Treaty of Alliance offensive and defensive with France, declared war against Great Britain.

From this short narrative, it will appear that, in almost every case, negotiation was attempted, even when indignity and violence had been committed. That in many instances it was successful; that in two of the three cases where hostilities were commenced, Spain was unequivocally the aggressor; that, in most of her adjustments, she stood upon ground at least equal, and in some superior to Great Britain; that in all of them she maintained a high sense of character and independence; and that, in points affecting the most delicate considerations of national honor, interest, and right, and where occurrences of a very irritating nature had taken place, and more aggravated than the one of which we justly complain, the path of negotiation was deemed the path of honor, by two of the great nations of Europe.

The practice of our Government has been uniformly conformable with the principles I have endeavored to establish, and I trust I shall be excused for bestowing particular consideration on this subject. We have heard much of the policy of WASHINGTON; it has been sounded in our ears from all quarters, and an honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) has triumphantly contrasted it with that adopted by the present Administration. I am not disposed to censure it in this case; on the contrary, I think it a high and respectable authority; but let it be properly understood in order to be rightly appreciated, and it will be found that the United States under his Administration, and that of his successor, have received injuries more deleterious, insults more atrocious, and indignities more pointed than the present, and that the pacific measure of negotiation was preferred. If our national honor has survived the severe wounds it then received, it may surely outlive the comparatively slight attack now made upon it; but if its ghost only now remains to haunt the consciences of the honorable gentlemen who were then in power, and who polluted their hands with the foul murder, let them not attempt to transfer the odium and the crime to those who had no hand in the guilty deed. The reins of Government were in their hands, and if the course they at that time pursued was diametrically opposite to that they now urge for our adoption, what shall we say of their consistency? What will they say of it themselves? What will their country say of it? Will it be believed that the tinkling sounds and professions of patriotism which have been so vehemently pressed upon us, are the emanations of sincerity, or will they be set down to the account of juggling imposture? Although but an infant nation, our career has been eventful and interesting. We have already had very serious collisions with three of the most powerful nations of Europe, who are connected with us by treaty, by neighborhood, and by commerce. Great Britain, France, and Spain, have successively committed very great aggressions upon our national rights. In stating these I have no intention of reviving feelings, which, I trust, have ceased with the causes which gave them birth, nor of aspersing the characters of nations who certainly hold the most important and respectable station in the civilized world. Our differences with Great Britain were coeval with the Treaty of Peace. The detention of the Western posts was a direct violation of that treaty; it diverted a considerable portion of the fur trade from the United States, and disabled us from bridling the hostile Indians, which was a source of immense injury. This evil continued for twelve years, under every circumstance of aggravation and insult. British soldiers issued from those forts into parts of our territory, where we exercised jurisdiction, and seized the persons of deserters without the aid or sanction of the authorities of the country; and these possessions served as asylums for the savages who were in hostile array against us, and as store-houses and magazines to supply them with arms, ammunition, and provisions. The seat of Government of Upper Canada was also held for a time at Niagara, in the State of New York, an indignity of the most marked character; many thousands of negroes were carried off in violation of the treaty, and a very serious injury was thereby inflicted on the agricultural pursuits of our Southern citizens. On the other hand, it was stated on the part of Great Britain that the treaty was violated by the United States, for that impediments had been interposed against the recovery of British debts by Legislative acts and Judicial decisions in several of the States. As there were mutual reclamations and reciprocal complaints, let us balance the account, and set off these grievances against each other; let us suppose that both parties acted right, and that no real cause of crimination existed, still I contend that the conduct of Great Britain, independent of the inexecution of the Treaty of Peace, was much more aggravated than the case before us.

It is well known that we were engaged in a bloody and expensive war with several of the Indian tribes; that two of our armies had been routed by them, and that we were finally compelled to make great efforts to turn the tide of victory. These Indians were encouraged and aided by the emissaries of Great Britain—British subjects were seen disguised fighting in their ranks, and British agents were known to furnish them with provisions and the implements of war. The Governor General of Canada, a highly confidential and distinguished officer, delivered a speech to the seven nations of Lower Canada, exciting them to enmity against this country; but in order to furnish the savages at war with sufficient aid, a detachment of British troops penetrated into our territory and erected a fort on the Miami river. Here the Indians, dispersed and defeated by Wayne, took refuge, and were protected under the muzzle of British cannon. A violation of territory is one of the most flagrant injuries which can be offered to a nation, and would in most cases justify an immediate resort to arms, because in most cases essential to self-defence. Not content with exciting the savages of America against us, Great Britain extended her hostility to the Eastern hemisphere, and let loose the barbarians of Africa upon us. A war existed at that time between Portugal and Algiers; the former blocked up the mouth of the Straits, by her superior naval force, and prevented the pirates from a communication with the Atlantic. Portugal has been for a long time subservient to the views of Great Britain; a peace was effected through the mediation of the latter; our unprotected merchantmen were then exposed, without defence, to the piracies of Algiers. Thus, in three quarters of the globe we at one time felt the effects of British enmity. In the meantime our commerce in every sea was exposed to her rapacity. All France was declared in a state of siege, and the conveyance of provisions expressly interdicted to neutrals. Paper blockades were substituted for actual ones, and the staple commodities of our country lay perishing in our store-houses, or were captured on the ocean, and diverted from the lawful proprietors. Our seamen were pressed wherever found; our protections were a subject of derision, and opposition to the imperious mandates of their haughty tyrants, was punished by famine or by stripes, by imprisonment or by the gibbet. To complete the full measure of our wrongs, the November Orders of 1793 were issued; our ships were swept from the ocean, as if by the operation of enchantment; hundreds of them were captured; almost all our merchants were greatly injured, and many of them reduced to extreme poverty.

These proceedings, without even a pretext, without the forms of justice, without the semblance of equity, were calculated to inflame every American feeling, and to nerve every American arm. Negotiation was however pursued; an Envoy Extraordinary, in every sense of the word, was sent to demand redress; and a Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, was formed and ratified. These events took place under the Administration of WASHINGTON. The Spanish Treaty, concluded on the 27th October, 1795, stipulated for a settlement of boundaries, and an adjustment of spoliation on commerce, and contained a declaration of the free navigation of the Mississippi, and a grant of the privilege of deposit at New Orleans. This treaty, for more than two years afterwards, was not executed on the part of Spain. In January, 1798, a report was made to Mr. ADAMS, by Mr. Secretary Pickering, and submitted to Congress, which charged Spain with retaining her troops and garrisons within the United States, with evading to run the boundary line, with stopping, controlling, and regulating the passage of our citizens on the Mississippi, and with sending emissaries among the Indians residing within our territories, in violation of the treaty and the relations of amity. Here then, a treaty, securing the important benefit of deposit, was in a state of inexecution for a long period. Our citizens were also interrupted in the free navigation of the Mississippi, and other aggressions, affecting our territorial rights, and our internal peace, were super-added. Was it at that time proposed by the honorable gentlemen who were then in power, as it now is, when they are deprived of it, to seize New Orleans with an armed force? Were they then so feelingly alive to the wrongs of our western brethren? Did they manifest that irritable sensibility for national honor which is now thundered in our ears with extraordinary emphasis? If it is right for us to act now in the way they propose, what will excuse them for not pursuing the same system then? Was their political vision darkened by the eminence on which they stood? And does it require the ordeal of adversity to open their eyes to a true sense of their country's honor and interest? Let them answer to their constituents, to their consciences, and their God.

An amicable explanation was had with Spain, and our wrongs were satisfactorily redressed. This took place in the Administration of Mr. ADAMS, and when most of the honorable gentlemen who support this war resolution, except such as were dangling in the Courts of Europe, held prominent stations in the councils of the country.

Our differences with France were of a more serious nature, and of a longer duration. They commenced in the Administration of WASHINGTON, and were adjusted in that of his successor. Great and enormous depredations were committed upon our commerce by France, and our merchants were fraudulently robbed of compensation for provisions supplied her in the hour of distress. The treaty and consular convention were violated. The right of embassy, a sacred right, respected even by the ferocious savage, was wantonly trampled upon; and the representative of our national sovereignty was refused a reception, and ignominiously ordered out of France. A fresh attempt at negotiation was made—three Ministers were sent, armed with all the powers, and clothed with all the honors of diplomacy; they were also refused a hearing, and were forced to leave the country without experiencing the forms of common civility. The treaty was then annulled, and reprisals directed; and when the honorable gentlemen and their friends, then in power, had worked up the passions of the nation to the highest pitch of exasperation; when war, bloody war, was expected from all quarters; when the war-worn soldiers of the Revolution were girding on their swords, and preparing to stand between their country and the danger that menaced her, the scene suddenly changed; the black cloud passed away; and we again beheld three Ministers at Paris, extending the olive-branch, burying all animosities, and returning with a treaty of "firm, inviolable, and universal peace, and true and sincere friendship." I shall not press this subject any further upon the feelings of the honorable gentlemen; I read in their countenances the emotions they experience.

I have thus shown that the course recommended for our adoption is not warranted by the laws and usage of nations, nor by the practice of our Government. I shall now examine whether it is not repugnant to the best interests of the country.

A vast augmentation of our national debt would be the certain consequence of this measure. It is a moderate estimate to say that our annual expenditures, over and above our surplus revenue, would be twenty millions of dollars; and we cannot reasonably expect that the war would continue a shorter period than five years. Hence one hundred millions would be added to our debt, and the great experiment which we are now trying (that of extinguishing it in fourteen years) would certainly fail—an experiment which has been defeated in Europe by war and prodigality; and for the success of which, in this country, every friend of republican government looks up with the greatest anxiety. But this is not all: heavy and oppressive taxation would be necessary, in order to pay off the interest of the accumulating debt, and to meet the other exigencies of Government. We are now a happy nation in this respect. Neither the temper nor the habits of our citizens will patiently submit to severe burdens, and happily the posture of our financial arrangements does not require them. Give the rein, however, to chimerical notions of war—embrace the proposition now submitted to us—and the weight of our impositions will be felt in every nerve and artery of our political system. Excises—taxes on houses and lands—will be introduced, and the evils of former Administrations will be multiplied upon us. But the mischief will not stop here: with the increasing calls for money from the people, their means to satisfy them will be diminished. The superior naval force of the enemy would cripple our commerce in every quarter of the globe. Great Britain and Spain hold the keys of the Mediterranean; we should therefore be entirely shut out of that sea, unless we could persuade the former to unite her exertions with ours. With the decay of our commerce; with our exclusion from foreign markets, the labors of our farmers would be palsied; the skill of our manufacturers would be rendered useless; and with the fruits of their industry perishing on their hands, or greatly undersold, how would they be able to meet the augmented wants of Government? What in the meantime would become of the claim of our merchants upon Spain, for at least five millions of dollars, and to what perils would your commercial cities be exposed? These certain evils would be encountered without producing the least benefit to our Western brethren. The seizure of New Orleans would vest us with a place of deposit; but a place of deposit, without the free use of the Mississippi, would be entirely useless. As long as the enemy holds the country below New Orleans, and possesses a superior naval force, so long we will be excluded from the Mississippi. Suppose, however, this obstacle removed; suppose we are enabled to pass into the Gulf without molestation; is it not necessary for vessels to hug the island of Cuba on their passage to the Atlantic States? And will not this expose them to certain capture, as long as Spain retains that important possession? To secure the great object said to be aimed at by this resolution, and to establish, beyond the reach of annoyance, a free communication between the Atlantic and Western States, we must seize not only New Orleans, but the Floridas and Cuba; and we must immediately create a formidable Navy. It is needless to mention that the Atlantic States are, with a few exceptions, the carriers of the Western produce. Three-fourths of that trade is managed by the merchants of the State I have the honor to represent. I therefore view this measure as pregnant with great mischief to the commerce of Atlantic America, and as a certain exclusion of the Western States from market, as long as the war shall continue.

It is no slight objection in the minds of the sincere friends of Republicanism that this measure will have a tendency to disadjust the balance of our Government, by strengthening the hands of the Executive, furnishing him with extensive patronage, investing him with great discretionary powers, and placing under his direction a large standing army. It is the inevitable consequence of war, in free countries, that the power which wields the force will rise above the power that expresses the will of the people. The State Governments will also receive a severe shock. Those stately pillars which support the magnificent dome of our National Government will totter under the increased weight of the superincumbent pressure. Nor will the waste of morals, the spirit of cupidity, the thirst of blood, and the general profligacy of manners, which will follow the introduction of this measure, be viewed by the great body of our citizens without the most fearful anxiety, and the most heartfelt deprecation. And if there are any persons in this country (and I should regret if there are any such in this House) who think that a public debt is a public blessing, and that heavy taxation is expedient in order to produce industry; who believe that large standing armies are essential to maintain the energy, and that extensive patronage is indispensable to support the dignity, of Government; who suppose that frequent wars are necessary to animate the human character, and to call into action the dormant energies of our nature; who have been expelled from authority and power by the indignant voice of an offended country, and who repine and suffer at the great and unexampled prosperity which this country is rapidly attaining under other and better auspices: Such men—whoever they are, and wherever they be—will rally around the proposition now before us, and will extol it to the heavens as the model of the most profound policy, and as the offspring of the most exalted energy.

If I were called upon to prescribe a course of policy most important for this country to pursue, it would be to avoid European connexions and wars. The time must arrive when we will have to contend with some of the great Powers of Europe, but let that period be put off as long as possible. It is our interest and our duty to cultivate peace, with sincerity and good faith. As a young nation, pursuing industry in every channel, and adventuring commerce in every sea, it is highly important that we should not only have a pacific character, but that we should really deserve it. If we manifest an unwarrantable ambition, and a rage for conquest, we unite all the great Powers of Europe against us. The security of all the European possessions in our vicinity will eternally depend, not upon their strength, but upon our moderation and justice. Look at the Canadas—at the Spanish territories to the South—at the British, Spanish, French, Danish, and Dutch, West India islands—at the vast countries to the West, as far as where the Pacific rolls its waves; consider well the eventful consequences that would result if we were possessed by a spirit of conquest; consider well the impression which a manifestation of that spirit will make upon those who would be affected by it. If we are to rush at once into the territory of a neighboring nation, with fire and sword, for the misconduct of a subordinate officer, will not our national character be greatly injured? Will we not be classed with the robbers and destroyers of mankind? Will not the nations of Europe perceive in this conduct the germ of a lofty spirit and an enterprising ambition which will level them to the earth, when age has matured our strength and expanded our powers of annoyance, unless they combine to cripple us in our infancy? May not the consequences be, that we must look out for a naval force to protect our commerce; that a close alliance will result; that we will be thrown at once into the ocean of European politics, where every wave that rolls, and every wind that blows, will agitate our bark? Is this a desirable state of things? Will the people of this country be seduced into it by all the colorings of rhetoric, and all the arts of sophistry—by vehement appeals to their pride, and artful addresses to their cupidity? No, sir. Three-fourths of the American people (I assert it boldly, and without fear of contradiction) are opposed to this measure. And would you take up arms with a millstone hanging around your neck? How would you bear up, not only against the force of the enemy, but against the irresistible current of public opinion? The thing, sir, is impossible; the measure is worse than madness; it is wicked beyond the powers of description.

It is in vain for the mover to oppose these weighty considerations by menacing us with an insurrection of the Western States, that may eventuate in their seizure of New Orleans without the authority of Government; their throwing themselves into the arms of a foreign Power; or in a dissolution of the Union. Such threats are doubly improper—improper as they respect the persons to whom they are addressed, because we are not to be deterred from the performance of our duty by menaces of any kind, from whatever quarter they may proceed; and it is no less improper to represent our Western brethren as a lawless, unprincipled banditti, who would at once release themselves from the wholesome restraints of law and order; forego the sweets of liberty, and either renounce the blessings of self-government, or, like the Goths and Vandals, pour down with the irresistible force of a torrent upon the countries below, and carry havoc and desolation in their train. A separation by a mountain, and a different outlet into the Atlantic, cannot create any natural collision between the Atlantic and Western States; on the contrary, they are bound together by a community of interests, and a similarity of language and manners—by the ties of consanguinity and friendship, and a sameness of principles. There is no reflecting and well principled man in this country who can view the severance of the States without horror, and who does not consider it as a Pandora's box, which will overwhelm us with every calamity; and it has struck me with not a little astonishment that, on the agitation of almost every great political question, we should be menaced with this evil. Last session, when a bill repealing a Judiciary act was under consideration, we were told that the Eastern States would withdraw themselves from the Union if it should obtain; and we are now informed that, if we do not accede to the proposition before us, the Western States will hoist the standard of revolt and dismember the empire. Sir, these threats are calculated to produce the evil they predict, and they may possibly approximate the spirit they pretend to warn us against. They are at all times unnecessary, at all times improper, at all times mischievous, and ought never to be mentioned within these walls.

If there be a portion of the United States peculiarly attached to republican government and the present Administration, I should select the Western States as that portion. Since the recent elections there is not a single Senator, or a single Representative in Congress, from that vast country, unfriendly to the present order of things, and, except in a part of the Mississippi Territory, and its whole population did not by the last census reach nine thousand souls, there is scarcely the appearance of opposition. To represent a people so republican, so enlightened, and so firm in their principles, as ready, without any adequate cause, (for no Government could watch over their interests with more paternal solicitude than the present, upon the present question,) to violate their plighted faith and political integrity—to detach themselves from the Government they love, and to throw themselves under the protection of nations whose political systems are entirely repugnant to their own, requires an extent of credulity rarely equalled—certainly never surpassed. If we examine the indications of public sentiment which have reached us, we see them breathing quite a contrary spirit. The Legislatures of Kentucky and the Mississippi Territory have expressed full confidence in the conduct of the Government, respecting the infraction of the treaty: Virginia, which embraces a respectable portion of western population, has done the same. The Legislature of Tennessee has not been in session, but, from the most recent and authentic accounts, we have every reason to believe that that State and the Indiana Territory are entirely satisfied with the position our Government has taken. The infant State of Ohio has presented us with an address couched in the warmest terms of affectionate attachment—equally honorable to her and to us; and her recent elections have manifested the same decided spirit: out of forty-five members returned to her first Legislature, there are only five to be found in the opposition. Pennsylvania is the only remaining

State which possesses any western territory, and I need only refer you to her elections, to demonstrate the extraordinary attachment to the Government which prevails in that great and respectable State. In the next Congress there will not be a single member in opposition from Pennsylvania, and her State elections have been attended with nearly the same distinguished unanimity. Under the influence of such honorable principles, and under the auspices of the great character who so deservedly holds the reins of her Government, and so extensively possesses the confidence of his fellow-citizens, we have nothing to apprehend on her part from the evils with which we have been so liberally menaced. Delaware, who has no western country, who carries on little or no trade with the Western States, and who has no immediate interest in the present question, has indeed lifted up her voice against the measures of the General Administration, and has demanded a more energetic course. I shall be the last man to speak disrespectfully of any of the State governments; I mean not to disparage the conduct of Delaware, and I trust I do not, when I say that New York, which has a greater interest in the Spanish infraction than any of the Atlantic States, is entitled to equal attention; and she has, through her Legislature and Executive, declared her warmest approbation of the course pursued by the General Government on this interesting occasion.

It is equally in vain for the honorable mover to declare that the seizure of New Orleans will facilitate negotiation, and avert war; that we will lose our character if we do not; that delay will give Spain time to prepare; that our Executive has taken no course that we know of; and that the opposition will lend us their aid if we follow their advice. In opposition to these suggestions, we say that the seizure of New Orleans is war in fact, and will shut out negotiation; that character is to be lost, not by firm and honorable moderation, but by rash and boyish precipitation; that delay is an evil that cannot be avoided, if we pursue the path of negotiation, which is the course our Government has taken, and that if it gives our adversary time for preparation, it will also furnish us with the same advantage; that however desirable it may be to produce an union of sentiment and action among our fellow-citizens, we are certain that it will not result from the adoption of the present measure; that the great body of the people will consider it rash and unjust; that in gaining the transient and doubtful support of a small minority, we will alienate the affections, and lose the confidence of our best friends, who will certainly desert us when we desert the laudable principles which ought alone to entitle us to their esteem and attachment.

If negotiation shall prove successful, and of this I have no doubt, all the evils resulting from war will be averted; if on the contrary, it shall eventuate unfortunately, and we shall be compelled to face all consequences, and risk all dangers in the maintenance of our national honor and national rights, great and abundant advantages will still result from the pursuit of this course, and we will be enabled to appeal to the sword, with a full conviction of the justice of our conduct, with the unanimous suffrage of our country, and to the perfect satisfaction of the world. In the mean time, we can form some necessary preparations, and we can ascertain the feelings and bearings of foreign Governments. Every day of procrastination will find us better prepared, and will give us more people, more resources, more treasure, more force, with less debt. Our national character will stand high for moderation and justice; our own citizens, and foreign nations, will entertain but one opinion on the subject; and we can then confidently appeal to that great and good Being, who holds in his hands the destiny of nations, to smile upon our cause; but if, in the inscrutable decrees of his providence, it is ordained that we must perish, we will at least fall with dignity, and maintain our character when we lose our existence.

Mr. DAYTON rose to answer the interrogatories which had been so vauntingly put by the honorable member from New York, (Mr. CLINTON.) He had asked, where were those gentlemen, who now advocate these strong resolutions, in that day when the British were committing their depredations upon our property, so lately as in 1794? For one, said Mr. D., I can answer. I was at my post in the other House, and the advocate of measures as strong, nay, stronger than those now proposed. I believe then, as I now do, that if the appointment of an Envoy Extraordinary could be followed by preparations for war in case of failure, it would contribute, not merely to the success of a negotiation, but also to the goodness of the terms. Why did not the gentleman from New York carry his inquiries back to the far more gloomy and trying times of 1776? Had he asked where we then were, said Mr. D., I could have told him that we, or some of us at least, were employed in his own State, upon the interior frontiers, defending the very people whom he now represents, from the irruptions of savages, and the devastation of an enemy. Where was then this honorable interrogator himself? Doubtless in some place of safety, perhaps dangling on the knee of the mother, or probably still in the egg-shell.

To what do all such questions tend? Certainly not to elucidate the subject, nor to conciliate parties. The long list of extraordinaries, with which the honorable gentleman from New York had introduced his argument, must have excited the expectation that his speech would partake of the same quality. Severe in his strictures upon declaimers, his own language was that of declamation; reprobating asperity in debate, on the part of others, he had indulged himself in a style little decorous or becoming, and exhausted against his opponents his full cup of bitterness. He had declared, with a boldness of assertion not unusual to him, that the resolutions under consideration contained declarations of war; but this was not the fact, they were merely intended as preparations for an event which some regard as inevitable, and all believe to be too probable. They went, indeed, to show, so far as declarations could do it, that the Legislature of the country know our rights and will defend them, and that those of the most distant of our citizens are as dear to us as the nearest. For the people of the western country, said Mr. D., I have long entertained an affection. This affection has not been confined to professions only; for during the twelve successive years for which I have had the honor of a seat in the two branches of the National Legislature, my votes will show that I have been uniform in my exertions to promote the security, growth, and happiness of that people. I have indeed, regarded them among the most meritorious portions of our citizens, because to them, we who sat in ease and security were indebted for extending our settlements into the wilderness, protecting an exposed frontier, and for enhancing the value of our territorial possessions; and because, but for them, but for their enterprise, their courage, and their industry, the waters of one of the finest rivers in the world would still flow useless to the ocean, or at least, without use or profit to the Atlantic States represented on this floor. These facts acknowledged, I ask whether we are not bound by the strongest moral and political obligations to make with these people a common cause, to feel their injuries as our own, and to avenge insults offered to them, as if directed immediately against ourselves? What is their present situation?—or rather let me ask, what are their grievances and complaints, and what have we done to redress them? The state of that country has been depicted by the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross) in colors high indeed, and lively, but most true and just. Whilst he proved that he felt for his brethren and remembered them—whilst he described their wrongs and sufferings in language the most animated, glowing, and impressive, he did not forget the temper which became him as a Senator, nor the great line of policy which, as a representative of the whole Union, it behooved him to regard. He told you, sir, what indeed you hear with every western wind and western mail, that the great and only outlet for the productions of nearly half a million of people, was closed upon them, or placed under such prohibitions as to render the navigation of the river almost useless; and that unless immediate relief were afforded them, their property would waste and perish on their hands; their only resources for paying their obligations to the public, and their debts to individuals, would fail, and the little real property they had acquired, would be sacrificed to make good the deficiency. These, sir, are not imaginary evils, but real; they are not confined to the inhabitants of the western waters, but extend, in their effects, to every part of our country. Allow me here to give a faint idea of the importance of the trade of that country, by reading extracts from a communication made to me, from a source in which I confide, and which is in a great measure drawn from official documents.

[Here Mr. DAYTON read a paper to show that three articles only of American produce, entered at New Orleans in 1801, (as taken from the custom-house books,) amounted to one million six hundred thousand dollars. These were cotton, tobacco, and flour; and that the other nine or ten principal articles of export from thence, in that year, would have swelled the whole to nearly four millions, but now would certainly exceed it. It further appeared, officially, that from the first of February to the tenth of June, 1802, one hundred and fifty vessels, of from 100 to 300 tons, cleared at the custom-house of New Orleans, and that eighty vessels more of 200 to 300 tons were necessary to take off the produce then in store. That the State of Tennessee produced one-fourth, or one million of it.]

Thus, then, we see, said Mr. D., that property amounting to four millions, annually exported in the first six months of the year, is to be embargoed at the will of a foreign Government, or the caprice of a Spanish Intendant, or, if permitted to pass at all, permitted under such restrictions and impositions as to take away all the profit of transportation, and render it scarcely worth the raising.

What have we done to remove the obstruction, and redress the wrong? We have sent a Minister itinerant from Paris to Madrid, and from Madrid to Paris, to negotiate upon this subject. There may be precedent for this; there may be courtesy in the measure; but what are precedents? What are the forms of courtly politeness, to an injured, an outraged, a starving people?

I have thus far confined myself, said Mr. D., to the injury, as relating to the interests of the country; but is nothing due to the dignity and honor of the nation most grossly insulted by the act? Let them who will be the dupes of the artful, insidious insinuation, that it is an unauthorized act, an irregular proceeding of a subordinate officer of a Government, which can punish with banishment or instant death the smallest deviation from duty. I do not believe the tale; I never believed it; and a late official act must undeceive all whose minds are not shut to the impressions of truth. A late proclamation issued from Baton Rouge, a Spanish port, one hundred and fifty miles above New Orleans, prohibits all intercourse between Spaniards and Americans. Our people descending the river, in pursuit of lawful commerce, are forbidden to buy an egg, or a mess of salt, or any comfort of life, from the possessor of the banks, in the long, dreary distance of two hundred and seventy miles. This proclamation is issued from their highest post, that it might extend more certainly and rapidly into every settlement; and thus our brethren, without provocation on their part, are cut off from those comforts, which, in all countries, are granted to all but open enemies. Will gentlemen call this, also, an unauthorized act of a Spanish Intendant? The irregular proceeding of a commandant of a Spanish post, or petty lord of Grandprè? This act was more offensive and more insolent than the other, because it inflicted upon us a more serious injury, without the slightest pretext of benefit to themselves.

Sir, said Mr. D., there was a time when, if the poorest individual among us could say to his brethren and his Government, "I am an American citizen, and have been insulted as such," he would have been listened to with interest, and poor and humble as he might have been, the dignity of the country would have been considered in some measure represented and attacked in him, and its spirit roused to resent the insult. But there is a time when, I fear, we are about to turn a deaf ear, or at least to listen with apathy, to the injuries inflicted upon half a million of our citizens, and the insults offered to the whole nation. I will not say that we are about to act as if honor, rights, and dignity may be graduated by a scale of cents and dollars, and even our liberties and independence have their price; but I will freely say, that tame submission to a single insult, leads, imperceptibly, to such a result—invariably to degradation, and necessarily to ruin.

It has been fashionable of late, Mr. President, with certain gentlemen, who make a boast of their own loyalty, to charge us, who compose what is called the minority, with hostility to the Administration, and a want of confidence in the Chief. Without deeming it necessary to deny or admit, in argument, such charges loosely made in the wantonness of debate, we are now prepared to submit ourselves, with them, to the touchstone of acts. If they believe that we distrust the management of our affairs, they will give us the more credit for sacrificing all personal or party considerations, when the good of our country requires unanimity. We are prepared to delegate the power and the means to defend, assert, and enforce our rights, to those hands which are pointed out by the Constitution, as the proper depository of so great a trust.

These resolutions are not absolutely imperative. The President may either use or forbear to use them, as he may think best for the public good. They amount to no declaration of war, but may save us from that calamity, by authorizing preparations for it. They cannot injure, but may aid your negotiation, and will show to our own countrymen, as well as to the world, that our reliance is placed, not on the soft glittering metals of Mexico and Peru, but on the harder metal of our own mountains.

Mr. COCKE.—Mr. President, the gentleman from New Jersey has said, that my friend from New York had furnished a dish for every palate; the gentleman should except his own, for it seems not to agree with him; his dish has been long filled with very different ingredients; he seems to have no relish but for war, havoc, and destruction; his constant food has been standing armies and strong naval establishments, with the offices and contracts attached to them. But how can the gentleman, as a lawyer, pretend to be so ignorant?

[Mr. DAYTON exclaimed that he was no lawyer, nor never was.]

The gentleman he had always understood to be a law character, but it was very certain he was no politician; his experience, however, could not have left him ignorant of the meaning of the resolution; for he must have known that the words may and shall are often considered in law as of the same force, particularly where they are used in defining authority to public officers; the resolutions, in this sense, would leave the Executive no choice, but would make it, as it were, his duty to go and take New Orleans.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has paid very high compliments to that part of the country which he had the honor to represent. He tells us of our militia, of our spirit, and of our taming the wilderness; but with all this eagerness for invasion by our militia, he does not offer us a single man from his own State; he cannot take upon him to say the people of Pennsylvania approve so much of his opinions as to go a single step with him, though Pennsylvania is as much interested in this business as we are.

As to confidence in the Administration, he was one of those who was ready to repose all proper confidence in the Executive; not under pretences of this and that and the other kind, but from real respect and knowledge of the Executive for thirty years past, in the trying times of 1776, and in all the trying times that followed. The mover of these resolutions tells us, that our attempts at negotiation are chimerical, as the wildest project of the human imagination, and he adds, that the insults which we have suffered are such as no other nation ever submitted to. While the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DAYTON) advises to go and drive out the people from New Orleans, or we lose our advantage, the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WHITE,) he was sorry to hear indulge in unbecoming expressions towards Spain. Speaking of that country, he talks of the sluggish Spaniard, whom we may easily overcome. Were these modes of argument or debate consistent or decent in this Senate? For his part, he did not wish to assail the territory or the rights of any nation, nor to abuse their characters; but it is the more extraordinary when those gentlemen, at the same time, tell us that it is France that sets the Spaniards on, and that we are afraid to look the hero of Italy and France in the face. Perhaps those who accuse us thus of fear would be the first to hide their faces from real danger. It is not boasting that makes the patriot or the man of courage; it is coolness and resolution. We do not fear the hero of Italy or any other hero, but we fear the effects of war, of an unjust and rash war.

We are told that, within a few years, our Western country, from being the seat of wild beasts, is covered with populous towns and cities; that the country, redeemed from a state of nature, has become civilized and covered with cultivation, and a people enjoying peace, happiness, industry, and commerce; and that their industry is obstructed. All this is admitted, and the evil allowed to be a serious one; but do we countenance or approve of it? Do we encourage it? No, sir, we are as much opposed to this conduct of the Spanish Intendant as gentlemen can be; perhaps more seriously so. But suppose we were to agree to arm, would we be prepared, even if we were to begin now, before we can have advice from Europe, and the whole rectified without us? Suppose our militia march to New Orleans, what would they find there? A grave for the majority of them. The precious boon of health is very scarce there; and our hardiest woodmen, from Kentucky and Tennessee, would soon find the climate too much for them.

It was somewhat surprising to him to find gentlemen opposed to the measures of the Executive now, who advocated similar measures on a former occasion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was one of those who voted for the British Treaty, and he was a supporter in the Senate even for the treaty which granted a tribute to Algiers; and in both those treaties the principle is laid down, that no hostility shall be commenced without a previous complaint or declaration. Then if this conduct was wise and just towards the Barbary Powers, it must be so with Spain. Why should not inquiry take place here, when we have the best reason to think the act that of an individual alone? The gentleman undertakes to answer for the western people, and tells us that they are ready to assemble, sword in hand, and go down the river and take New Orleans. We were told on another occasion, that when they would go down, they must be defeated, and that the consequence would be, that they would make terms for themselves, join the French, and become our most inveterate enemies! This is the way my constituents are complimented by gentlemen who wish to be considered as their friends. It was surprising that those gentlemen who had never been in that part of the country, and who pretend to know so much about them, should know everything but what their representatives know to be the truth. But sir, these frightful spectres have been presented to us in so many shapes, and on so many occasions, that they are no longer calculated to frighten us; and whenever gentlemen are at a loss for arguments, we look for them with as much certainty as for rain from the clouds.

Sir, we do not wish for war in the western countries; we sincerely wish for peace and good neighborhood. The Spaniards, our neighbors, appear to be a friendly, candid, honest people; we do not seek a quarrel with them: but if their Government should do us wrong, we do not want the spirit to do ourselves right at all hazards; but, without that injury, there is no spirit to do them wrong. But whenever the gentleman (Mr. Ross) feels his blood warm, the nation must go with him to war, or the national honor is lost; and in this spirit he tells us that negotiation must fail. He thought that even if negotiation should fail, then the whole national spirit would be roused, and we should go to the assertion of our rights with the greatest effect.

But it is said that when we return home we shall be told that our conduct has been mysterious, that we have discussed the public affairs with closed doors, that we do not trust the people with their own affairs, and that they would trust us no longer. But, sir, we have no wish to keep anything secret from our constituents; he had their unanimous confidence, and the only fear he ever felt, was, lest he should not be able to discover what was their best interests. He knew that the people would speak in a manly tone to their representatives, as well as to their adversaries, and if their representatives conduct themselves improperly, they will dismiss them: nevertheless, if a question arose between his sense of duty and an apprehension of that kind, he would do his duty, because the people would in the end approve of his conduct. But why does the gentleman so much complain of closed doors; did he suppose any one in that House entertained apprehensions of his persuasive powers? He, for one, thought very little about it. It did not excite his sympathies any more than the metal of Mexico, or of our mountains; he was neither afraid of the thunder of his eloquence nor solicitous for the plunder of the Spanish mines. If real causes for war arose, he should not expect to see those now so eager for wanton attack in the front ranks. To those then who ask, will you preserve peace where there is no peace? he would reply, that is not the question; the true question is, will you have war where you may preserve peace? Gentlemen want to know, what is the Executive about? Why do they not go and ask him? He has no reserves, he will tell them, without disguise, that he is solicitous to preserve peace if possible, and if that is not to be done, then to defend the country and assert its rights with the energy and dignity becoming an independent Republic.

The gentlemen, in order to show us how very kind they will be to us, say, that if we will only go to war with Spain, they will be our pledges to the western people, and that their friends in the other House, and out of doors, would do the same. Why this is very generous of them, and is the more remarkable because it is an uncommon thing with them. But it is very certain that we do not stand in need of their pledges, nor of their assistance. On former occasions they did not display any of this liberality, and he could not help suspecting their sincerity now. He was against war on any terms but necessity or defence; if there is no alternative he would go into it as heartily as any one. But he had seen war, the war of our independence, and he was averse to a renewal of calamities such as were then suffered. Where were the Mars and Jupiter of the present day in those times that tried men's souls? Where were they when our wives and children were delivered up to massacre? The thunder of Jupiter was then never heard of, and Mars himself was most probably asleep with Bellona. He was averse to war from the example which we had very lately, of the oppressive consequences of a disposition to war; those oppressive taxes and heavy debts, and unpopular laws which we have been saddled with, which we have since repealed, and he hoped never again to see revived.

Mr. J. MASON, (of Massachusetts,) did not expect to throw much new light on a subject which had been so ably displayed by the mover of the resolutions; he had formed his opinion from mature reflection, and every argument he had heard offered against the resolutions, only tended to confirm the opinions he had formed in their favor. They had been dubbed war resolutions; but he could not discover anything of war in them; on the contrary, he considered them as entirely of a pacific character. What do they purport?

Resolved, That the United States of America, have an indisputable right to the free navigation of the river Mississippi, and to a convenient deposit for their produce and merchandise in the island of New Orleans.

"That the late infraction of such their unquestionable right, is an aggression hostile to their honor and their interest.

"That it does not consist with the dignity or safety of this Union to hold a right so important by a tenure so uncertain.

"That it materially concerns such of the American citizens as dwell on the western waters, and is essential to the union, strength, and prosperity of these States, that they obtain complete security for the full and peaceable enjoyment of such, their absolute right.

"That the President be authorized to take immediate possession of some place or places, in the said island, or the adjacent territories, fit and convenient for the purposes aforesaid, and to adopt such measures for obtaining that complete security, as to him, in his wisdom, shall seem meet.

"That he be authorized to call into actual service any number of the militia of the States of South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, and the Mississippi Territory, which he may think proper, not exceeding fifty thousand, and to employ them, together with the naval and military force of the Union, for effecting the object above mentioned; and that the sum of five millions of dollars be appropriated to the carrying into effect the foregoing resolutions, and that the whole or any part of the sum be paid or applied on warrants drawn in pursuance of such directions as the President may from time to time think proper to give to the Secretary of the Treasury."

Is this not true; do we not agree in this unanimously; will any member of the Senate deny it? Is not our right to the navigation of that river a natural and inviolable right? It is not a favor granted to us, but is derived from nature itself; the treaty indeed describes the middle of the river as our boundary, but is it not perfectly free? What objection then can be made to this resolution? What does it further say? that we have an unquestionable right to the deposit at New Orleans; have we not that right? It does not say that we have a right to the territory, but no man can controvert our positive and absolute right to the deposit of our commodities in that Territory forever; it is a right unlimited for ages, and the written instrument under which it is established can never be done away while the two nations exist. It is further declared that this right is important; can this be denied? Nor can it be said to be exclusively important to the people in the immediate vicinity of the Mississippi, for it involves, directly or indirectly, the whole of the States; it involves their internal trade, and their credit on the Atlantic side of the Union; and it imposes on the people by diminishing the value of their produce. Upon every principle of right and safety the resolutions should be supported.

Some gentlemen, nevertheless, doubted that this infraction of the treaty was authorized. He did not enter into this spirit of doubt; he had no doubt that it was the authorized act of either France or Spain. It is now from twelve to eighteen months since the rumor of the cession of Louisiana has prevailed, and no authentic information on the subject has ever been furnished to the people of the United States; contradictory rumors had also gone abroad, but to this moment we are in a total state of uncertainty on the subject. How then are we to account for this secrecy? If Spain determined to deprive us of a right, would she inform us of it by a message? No, she would pursue exactly the conduct she has done. The Spanish Minister here, indeed says, that the act is not authorized, or he should have been informed of it. The plain meaning of this is, that he is not sufficiently informed. The period at which this infraction took place affords strong presumption of the motive and design. It took place at the moment when the French thought they had completely overcome the blacks, and restored the island of St. Domingo to obedience; they had determined that the subjugation of that island should precede the attempt upon Louisiana, and in the moment of their imaginary triumph, they commenced their operations at New Orleans, by the suspension of our right. As to the assertions that Louisiana will be ceded or is ceded, with a special regard to our limits, he did not regard them; they were evidently made only to lull us.

The next resolution authorized the President to take possession of New Orleans. This may at first sight have the appearance of war; but if gentlemen will only call to mind their own declarations, that our right is indisputable, then the aggression has been against us. This point is essential to a fair consideration of the case. If, then, they have committed an hostile act, if they have deprived us of a natural and conventional right, if they have broken a treaty, does there any question remain but as to the means that ought to be employed to recover it? On this point the Senate is divided, there are two opinions; one for negotiating to have the right restored; the other, to possess it without delay. In the choice of one or the other of these recourses, he had no hesitancy; for possession will be the best guarantee to negotiation. Without that possession, negotiation must be a work of time, and always at the mercy of diplomatic procrastination. What will be the situation of the country in the mean time? The importation ceases, and the export stops. The western people will say that the hand of Government, intended for their protection, is withheld from them, that we want zeal, and avoid justice in their cause. Spain and France know the western country as well as we do; they have an intimate knowledge of it; their able men have visited all parts of it. Instead, therefore, of supplanting them, they should be put in the situation of supplicants to us; the inhabitants of that vast tract confide more on the United States than they do on France or Spain. We are therefore taking the most safe and certain measures. It is the opposition, Mr. President, who are in favor of supporting the Executive, and not those who profess to be its friends.

Mississippi Question.

SENATE.

What, sir, is the language that France will hold to you, if these resolutions are not carried? The First Consul will say, Why do you supplicate me, and what regard should I pay you? You are a divided people; parties are nearly balanced among you; what are your complaints to me? But gentlemen say, the step recommended would be an invasion of their territory; but surely this is not a greater wrong than the invasion of our rights. We do not go to make ourselves masters of the soil; our only object is, to hold them as a pledge for the security of our rights by treaty. Gentlemen had referred to the transactions at Nootka Sound, between England and Spain. If he were to quote any case in preference to another, in support of the resolutions, it would be that. The British landed at Nootka, they erected a fortification; and what did the Spaniards do? They did not wait the tardy course of negotiation; they went with a force, attacked the settlement, and broke it up; and when they had taken this precautionary measure, they agreed to negotiate, and the effect was favorable as it was honorable to the spirit of Spain. The best way to negotiate is with the alternative visible; if we should send by Mr. Monroe the account of our entering and holding the pledge of New Orleans, he might go to France or Spain with double confidence. If the whole province of Maine were invaded by an enemy, it would not be of so much importance as the stoppage of that river; if that was taken, or if the island of New York was in possession of an enemy, would we wait to negotiate? The aggression is on their part, and the consequences they alone ought to be accountable for.

The resolutions he did not consider as imperative on the Executive; but if gentlemen were desirous of so altering the phraseology, as to render them more explicitly optional, he was willing to accommodate them, and to leave it in the breast of the President to take possession or not, as the exigency may require; money and men are offered for his use, and he may use or not use them, according to his own judgment. In the course taken, we are pursuing a shadow—we are in truth sleeping under injury. War was certainly a serious thing, but all nations have been obliged to resort to it; it produces an energy in the human character, which never exists without it. What was the effect on our own country, under a strong sense of injury, and at a time when we were so many degrees inferior in numbers and resources to what we are at present? At the commencement of our own Revolution, we had scarcely any resources, yet armies were raised, arms and arsenals provided, and we triumphed over the most powerful nation then in Europe. We suffered some evils, in the loss of many brave and valuable men; but even in that loss we had the consolation, as it produced an energy, a heroism, that will immortalize them to the latest posterity. It has been insinuated, that such a step would alarm foreign nations. But turn your attention to the immediate consequences. It would be impossible for us to be involved in a war with France or Spain without having the navy of Great Britain on our side; necessity and the wisest policy would unite us, and we should bid defiance to all the maritime Powers. But on the other hand, is not France as desirous of peace as any nation can be; is it not her interest to be at peace, seeing the immense conquests which she has made and secured? Do we not also know that Great Britain feels an eternal jealousy of her rival, and is she not this moment interfering, not to rescue her own territories, but to preserve the territories of others from being devoured. He was, upon the most mature examination of the subject, in favor of the resolutions, and against the amendments.

Mr. J. JACKSON, of Georgia.—Coming from a State, at the extreme of the Union in the South, and excepting the States immediately interested in the navigation of the Mississippi, the most concerned on the present occasion, of any in the Union, he hoped it would not be deemed improper in him to offer his sentiments on the resolution before the Senate; for, sir, no event can affect the settlers on the Mississippi, no change of masters can take place there, without the shock being felt on the frontiers of Georgia. The nation which holds New Orleans must eventually possess the Floridas, and Georgia cannot remain an indifferent spectator; in case of war, the blow struck on that river will be vibrated on the Saint Mary's, and the attack on the one will be seconded by an attack on the other.

The gentlemen from Kentucky and Tennessee have not those fears expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; they have declared their citizens satisfied with negotiation in the first place, and the conduct pursued by the Executive. He could say the same, as respects the citizens of the State he represents, and begged leave to read a letter on the subject, from a respectable gentleman of Georgia, applauding the appointment of Mr. Monroe. [He here read a letter expressing the approbation generally expressed at the nomination.]

That there has been an indignity offered to the United States, by the Spanish Government of New Orleans, he should not deny; so far, he joined the gentlemen on the other side, as not only to declare that sense of it, but to assert that the withdrawing the right of deposit, given under the fourth article of our treaty with Spain, concluded at San Lorenzo el Real, prior to the pointing out another place for that purpose, is such a violation of our right, and such an insult to the dignity of the nation, as ought not to be put up with in silence. We ought, we are bound to demand a restoration of that right, and to secure it to our western citizens, let the risk be what it may, if it even extends to life and fortune. He cordially agreed with the gentleman who had preceded him, (Mr. MASON,) that it is a momentous subject; but could not consent to go at once to war, without trying, in the first place, every peaceable mode to obtain redress.

But the gentleman sees no war in the resolutions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. ROSS.) He could not agree with him on that point; let us examine them, and it will not only be found that they contain war measures, but that part of the premises on which we are called upon to go to war, are not founded. The first part of the resolutions declares, that the United States have an indisputable right to the free navigation of the river Mississippi, and to a convenient place of deposit for their produce and merchandise, in the island of New Orleans. Now, sir, the former part of this resolution is not affected by any proceedings of the Spanish Government. You are as perfectly in possession of the right as you ever were; your vessels are at this moment freely navigating that river; you have not heard of a single interruption; you have not learnt that the Spaniards, so far from interrupting that navigation, have ever doubted your right. Why then, sir, resolve on the assertion of rights which are not questioned, but of which you are completely in possession? He could compare it to no other case than that of a man in private life, in peaceable possession of his house, resolving on and publishing his own right to it, and thereby rousing the suspicions of his neighbors to doubt the title to it. Passing over the latter division of the first resolution, and which he acknowledged to be the fact, let us consider the second proposition, "That the late infraction of such their unquestionable right, is an aggression hostile to their honor and interest." Sir, after a declaration of this kind, can you retract? You cannot; it is in fact a declaration of war itself. Many of the Courts of Europe would consider it so, and have engaged in war for less cause of offence than this resolution contains. You pronounce at once, without knowing whether the proceedings at New Orleans were sanctioned by the Court of Spain, that that nation is in a state of hostility against your honor and interest, which declaration, coupled with the following resolution, "That it does not consist with the dignity or safety of this Union to hold a right so important by a tenure so uncertain," is a direct insult to that nation. But if war is not to be found in those resolutions, is it not in the fifth resolution, "That the President be authorized to take immediate possession of such place or places in the said island, or the adjacent territories, as he may deem fit or convenient." Is this not war? If it be not, he knew not what war was! And now let us inquire, if we should be justified in adopting those measures, on the grounds of public or private justice, or the laws of nations.

Sir, the going to war has always been considered, even among barbarous nations, a most serious thing; and it has not been undertaken without the most serious deliberation. It was a practice among the Romans, prior to undertaking a war, to consult the faciales on the justice of it; and, after it had been declared just, to refer it to the Senate, to judge of the policy of it; and unless the justice and the policy were both accorded in, the war was not undertaken. If this was the case then, among barbarous nations, shall we, who call ourselves a civilized nation, not well weigh the justice and the policy of going to war, before we undertake it? Two gentlemen, who preceded him, (Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE and CLINTON,) have read some passages on those points, from the law of nations, and he begged to be indulged in reading one or two more; they are from Burlemaqui, 2d vol. p. 264, ch. 4, of those things which ought to precede war:

"However just reason," says this author, "we may have to make war, yet as it inevitably brings along with it an innumerable number of calamities, and oftentimes acts of injustice, it is certain we ought not to proceed too easily to a dangerous extremity, which may perhaps prove fatal to the conqueror himself. Supposing the reason of war is just in itself, yet the dispute ought to be about something of great consequence, since it is better even to relinquish part of our right, when the thing is not considerable, than to have recourse to arms to defend it." Again: "We ought to have at least a probable appearance of success, for it would be a criminal temerity to expose ourselves to certain destruction, and to run into a greater in order to avoid a lesser evil." "Lastly," says this writer, "there should be a real necessity for taking up arms; that is, we ought not to have recourse to force, but when we can employ no milder method of recovering our right, or of defending ourselves from the evils with which we are menaced. For, as a Sovereign ought to take particular care of the State, and its subjects, he should not expose them to the evils with which war is attended, except in the last extremity, and when there is no other expedient left but that of arms."

What is our course, then, to pursue? Is it to go immediately to war, without asking for redress? By the law of nations, and the doctrines of all writers on them, you are not justified until you have tried every possible method of obtaining redress in a peaceable manner: it is only in the last extremity, when you have no other expedient left, that a recourse to arms is lawful and just; and he hoped the United States would never forfeit her character for justice, by any hasty or rash steps, which she may, too late, have to repent of—when she can have recourse to another method which may procure a redress of the wrong complained of.

Let us now look to the policy of adopting those resolutions, which must inevitably involve the United States in war, and stir up the jealousy of European nations. They watch you already with a jaundiced eye, although the nation is in its infancy. Yes, sir, our nation is as it were, in comparison with other nations, an infant; but it is a Hercules in its cradle, and they know it! They will seek every means to check its growth; and they will seize on every occasion to curb it, if they perceive any serious evidences of its ambition. Your taking possession of New Orleans would afford such evidence; it would rouse them; they would be alarmed for their own possessions near you, and would combine to put a stop to your career. Would it be honorable then, sir, to retrace your steps after you have taken possession? Would it comport with the national honor and dignity we have heard so much about? He need not answer the question.

To induce us to seize the present moment in taking possession of the island, an honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) has told us that, if we delay the present moment, we shall not meet a weak, an inanimate enemy—the sluggish Spaniard; the slave of France—but the bayonets of the invincible band of French grenadiers! Sir, in such a hostile proceeding, as we are called on to adopt, he believed that even the sluggish Spaniard would be roused from his slumber, and join in the cry against us.

An honorable gentleman, the mover of the resolutions, informed us the other day, that, by negotiation, you would not only take away every chance of payment of the spoiliations on our commerce by Spain from the merchants, but you would also take away all ability from the Western people to pay those merchants what they owed them at home, whereby they would be double sufferers. Shall we reverse this picture, and see how the merchants would fare if the resolutions were adopted? Sir, they would be received as a measure of decided war, a perfect war manifesto; and the property of your merchants, their ships, their merchandise, that are scattered over the globe—they would be embargoed in every port of France and Spain, and captured in all directions. The capital of your merchants would be destroyed, and the hopes of redress for former spoiliations be destroyed with it; and then we should be little nearer the main object of redress, as to a place of deposit, than we are at present; on the contrary, a negotiation will place your merchants on their guard, they will watch its result, and afford them an opportunity to secure their property.

As to national honor and dignity, he believed we have all a proper sense of it, and he would be one of the last on this floor to put up with insult and indignity from any nation; but, as much as we had heard of it, he did not think we ought, without negotiation, to resent every injury by war. In many cases, national honor is only a convertible term for national interest; and he begged leave to relate an anecdote of a celebrated soldier on this head. After the failure of the attempted storm of Savannah, in the year 1779, Count D'Estaing, who was wounded in the attack, and lay in that situation about five miles from Savannah, was visited by Governor Rutledge and other gentlemen of South Carolina and Georgia. The Governor having perceived some movements in camp indicative of a retrograde motion, told the Count that his own honor and the honor of France were concerned in his remaining and taking the city. The Count very mildly replied, "Gentlemen, if my honor is to be lost by not taking the city, it is lost already; but I deem my honor to consist in the honor of my country, and that honor is my country's interest!" The time of operation in the West Indies was arrived, and the Count re-embarked his troops.

Now, sir, is it not our duty to consult our country's interest, before we take this rash step, which we cannot recall? Peace is the interest of all Republics, and war their destruction; it loads and fetters them with debt, and entangles not only the present race, but posterity. Peace, sir, has been the ruling policy of the United States through all her career. If we show the citizens that we are not willing to go to war, and load them with taxes, they will all be with us, when a necessity for war arrives. What, sir, was the policy of America, from the commencement of the Revolution? At that day, did we hastily go to war? No; we tried every peaceable means to avoid it, and those means induced a unanimity in the people.

At the commencement many States were exceedingly divided, in some a majority were against us; yet, seeing the moderation and justice of our measures, and the rashness and tyranny of the British cabinet, they came over to our side, and became the most zealous among us. At the present moment, sir, the people are averse to war, they are satisfied with the steps of the Executive, they wish negotiation. If you adopt these resolutions, they will be still divided; if you negotiate, and fail in that negotiation—if you cannot obtain a redress of the injury which they feel as well as you, they will go all lengths with you, and be prepared for any event; you will have this advantage, you will be unanimous, and America united is a match for the world. In such case, sir, every man will be anxious to march, he would go himself if called on, and whether the sluggish Spaniard or the French grenadier commands New Orleans, it must fall; they will not be able to resist the brave and numerous hosts of our Western brethren, who are so much interested in the injury complained of. He was himself of opinion that New Orleans must belong to the United States; it must come to us in the course of human events, although not at the present day; for he did not wish to use force to obtain it, if we could get a redress of injury; yet it will naturally fall into our hands by gradual but inevitable causes, as sure and certain as manufactures arise from increased population and the plentiful products of agriculture and commerce. But let it be noticed, that if New Orleans by a refusal of justice falls into our hands by force, the Floridas, as sure as fate, fall with it. Good faith forbids encroachment on a pacific ally; but if hostility shows itself against us, interest demands it; Georgia in such case could not do without it. God and nature have destined New Orleans and the Floridas to belong to this great and rising empire. As natural bounds to the South, are the Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Mississippi, and the world at some future day cannot hold them from us.

Sir, we have been told much by the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) of Bonaparte; that he is the hero of France, the conqueror of Italy, and the tyrant of Germany; and of his invincible legions. Much as he respected the fame and exploits of that extraordinary man, he believed we should have little more to fear from him than from the sluggish Spaniard. Bonaparte, sir, in our Southern country, would be lost, with all his martial talents; his hollow squares and horse artillery would be of little service to him in the midst of our morasses and woods, where he would meet not with the champaign country of Italy, with the little rivulets commanded by his cannon, which he could pass at leisure; not fortified cities which command surrounding districts; but with rivers miles wide, and swamps, mortal or impenetrable to Europeans. With a body of only ten thousand of our expert riflemen around him, his laurels would be torn from his brow, and he would heartily wish himself once more safe on the plains of Italy.

What, sir, would be forty, or fifty thousand French, in those impenetrable forests, to the hosts which would be poured down the Mississippi! But, sir, should Bonaparte send an army of forty thousand men here, and they should not be destroyed by our troops, within twenty years they would become Americans, and join our arms; they would form connexions with our females, intermarry with them, and insensibly change their habits, their manners, and their language. No other people can long exist in the vicinity of those of the United States, without intermixing and ultimately joining with them.

The sacred name of WASHINGTON has been unnecessarily appealed to, on this as on many other occasions, and we have been boastfully told that, in his time, no nation dared to insult us. Much, sir, as he revered his memory and acknowledged him among the fathers of his country—was this the fact? Was he not insulted—was not the nation insulted—under his Administration? How came the posts detained after the definitive treaty by Britain? What dictated that inhuman deed to stir up havoc and destruction among us? Lord Dorchester's insolent and savage speech to the hordes of Indians on our frontiers, to massacre our inhabitants without distinction. Were those not insults, or have we tamely forgotten them? Yet, sir, did WASHINGTON go to war? He did not; he preferred negotiation, and sent an Envoy to Britain; peace was obtained by a treaty with that nation—he should not inquire at what price—but these were the steps taken by him. Shall we then not negotiate; shall we not follow the leading feature of national policy? He hoped we should, and by doing so we shall become unanimous. We are all actuated, he hoped, by one view, but differ on the means; let us do justice by requesting our neighbor to do justice to us, by a restoration of our rights; let us show the nations of the earth we are not anxious for war, that scourge of mankind; that we bear patiently our injuries, in hopes of redress, and that nothing but absolute denial of justice, which will be additional insult, shall induce us to it. But, sir, if forced to war, contrary to our policy and our wishes, let us unsheath the sword and fling away the scabbard, until our enemies be brought to a sense of justice, and our wrongs are redressed.

He apologized to the House, it was a late hour, and he would no longer detain them, although he had many more observations to offer on the remarks of gentlemen, which have been made on this floor. That we may be guided in our deliberations by prudence as our advanced guard, and determination as our rear, was his sincere prayer, and that the result of those deliberations may be for the advantage and happiness of our common country.

Mr. TRACY rose, and moved that the House now adjourn. Adjourned accordingly at half-past five o'clock.

THURSDAY, February 24.

The Message received yesterday from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was read, as follows:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you a report of the Secretary of State on the case of the Danish brigantine Henrick, taken by a French privateer in 1799, re-taken by an armed vessel of the United States, carried into a British island, and there adjudged to be neutral; but, under an allowance of such salvage and costs as absorbed nearly the whole amount of sales of the vessel and cargo. Indemnification for these losses, occasioned by our officers, is now claimed by the sufferers, supported by the representations of their Government. I have no doubt the Legislature will give to the subject that just attention and consideration which it is useful as well as honorable to practise in our transactions with other nations, and particularly with one which has observed towards us the most friendly treatment and regard.

FEB. 23, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Ordered, That the Message and papers therein referred to lie for consideration.

The bill, yesterday brought up from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, and for other purposes,'" was read, and ordered to the second reading.

The bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, NICHOLAS, and DAYTON, to consider and report thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT communicated to the Senate a report from the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, on the emoluments of the officers employed in the collection of the customs for the year 1802; which was read, and ordered to lie on file.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 22d instant, the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and three," reported it without amendment.

Mr. ELLERY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 18th instant, the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States,' and to the act, entitled, 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,'" reported it without amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the transfer of the duties of supervisor to any other office," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read, and ordered to the second reading.

MISSISSIPPI QUESTION.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions respecting the indisputable right of the United States to the free navigation of the Mississippi, together with the proposed amendments thereto.

Mr. WELLS, of Delaware, said he had listened yesterday, with great attention, to gentlemen who had opposed the resolutions moved by his honorable friend, (Mr. Ross,) from Pennsylvania. I cannot say that I expected, but I did entertain at least a faint hope they would be able to satisfy us that our fears were groundless, that the honor of our country was unblemished, its interest not impaired, its safety not endangered. But had I a doubt before, it no longer remains; their arguments have convinced me more than ever that we have not a moment to lose. Yet, sir, almost the whole of the present session has passed away without a single measure of defence being adopted. Even now I foresee that the resolutions will be laid aside. I rejoice, however, to find that they are likely to produce one good effect; they have at last roused gentlemen from the false security in which they have so long reposed. If the resolutions now under discussion do not prevail, I will not refuse to vote for the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE.) I prefer the resolutions because they go no further and apply the remedy directly to the evil: the amendment contemplates the possibility of a failure of negotiation, and makes some provision for such an event.

These resolutions have been opposed upon two grounds; First, it is alleged that the conduct of the Intendant at New Orleans is not authorized by the Court of Spain. Second, it is said that we are bound by moral obligation to resort to negotiation before we attempt to redress ourselves.

Did I even believe, with gentlemen on the other side of the House, that the violation of our right of deposit was the act of the Intendant alone, I would vote in favor of these resolutions. I should still be for going down, and taking possession of New Orleans, and thereby putting in check the power of the Intendant, until we could hear from Europe. If we are to wait for the result of a negotiation just now commenced, consider the situation of the western country in the interim. Half a million of your citizens are cut off from all intercourse with the rest of the world; every kind of business there is at a stand; the farmer's produce is rotting on his hands; industry is paralyzed; emigration discouraged; the value of their lands diminished; all ability to comply with their engagements with each other, with the Government of the United States, or with their own State governments, is taken from them. This is an extremity to which I can never consent to reduce them. Let us, rather, remove the obstruction to the navigation of the Mississippi immediately; and if in the course of the negotiation it should be proven to our satisfaction that the violation complained of was not authorized by France or Spain, and that both nations were resolved to respect our rights, New Orleans might then be restored. No cause of umbrage would be given to either nation. They would both see the extent of the injury we were likely to sustain by the criminal conduct of their agents; and, if they were honest, they would sincerely rejoice that we had in time guarded against it.

Gentlemen have persuaded themselves that the conduct of the Intendant is not authorized by the Spanish or French Government; but what reason have they assigned us in support of this opinion? They tell us of the friendly assurances received from the Minister of His Catholic Majesty resident near our Government; and they place considerable stress upon the circumstance of the Governor of New Orleans disapproving of what the Intendant has done. I will not stop to speak of the imprudence of reposing themselves upon the assurances of a Minister, perhaps expressly instructed to mislead them. But why have they trusted to the imaginary collision of sentiment between the Governor and Intendant of New Orleans? Do not gentlemen know that our Government is in possession of testimony, demonstrating beyond all kind of doubt, that this is not the fact? Have they not seen the letter of the Governor of New Orleans to the Governor of the Mississippi Territory? In this letter I learn that the Governor comes out and acknowledges his co-operation with the Intendant, justifies the breach of the treaty, and declares that these instruments cease their binding force the moment it suits the interest of either party to break through them. Alas! the history of the world furnishes us too many evidences of this melancholy truth. But this is the first time that any nation has had the hardihood to avow it. No, sir, even Carthage herself, who became proverbial for her disregard of treaties, never attained to a point so profligate. If I am incorrect in my statement, honorable gentlemen, who have easier access to the sources of official information than is permitted to us, will set me right. Why has this document been so sedulously kept from the public eye? Why it should be even now so carefully locked up, is a mystery not for me to unravel.

We are told that there is a moral obligation imposed upon the nations, to try the effect of negotiation, before they attempt to redress themselves. I do not admit the force of this rule, where negotiation is not expected to succeed; where it cannot in its nature afford effectual relief. Believing as I do, that negotiation must fail, I am not for trusting to that alone. It has long been evident that the French have attached to these territories upon our frontier, an importance which of themselves they do not bear, and which can only be attributed to them on account of their connexion with our Southern and Western States. If you treat, therefore for an extension of your limits, you will be disappointed. If you negotiate respecting the right of deposit, and should succeed, you will obtain no better security than that which has already been found ineffectual. For my part, I am strongly impressed with an opinion that the French Consul has a project in view, deeply hostile to the prosperity of our country. One great object with the French is, to increase their maritime strength. The position which they are about to take in New Orleans, will soon put them, at our expense, into the possession of an immense carrying trade, and reduce under their influence the fairest-portion of our empire.

Perhaps I may be asked, does the French Consul imagine that the people of the United States will consent to see subjected to foreign domination any part of their territory? This is an inquiry which Bonaparte has not been much in the habit of making. He knows the extent of the means he possesses in this country. It is but a few years since violent jealousies prevailed between the Atlantic and Western States. Fortunately they have now subsided; these jealousies he will endeavour to rekindle. Possibly he may calculate upon detaching the people on the seaboard from the support of their brethren on the western waters. He has already succeeded in concealing the hand which guided the pen of the Intendant at New Orleans. His troops are probably now approaching our shores, and what means of precaution have you adopted? Let not gentlemen flatter themselves that Great Britain will interfere to arrest this scheme of French aggrandizement. That Government is already staggering under its own burdens. Their tottering situation has been acknowledged on the floor of the British Parliament. She is obliged to look on, and tamely submit to the extension of the Gallic power, in all quarters of the world; she knows that her rival is strengthening herself in every direction. Notwithstanding the cession of Louisiana, New Orleans, and, perhaps, the Floridas, was carefully concealed from her at the Treaty of Amiens, she is now acquainted with it, and yet she sees the armament destined for these countries preparing to depart, without daring to remonstrate. No, sir, every dependence that we place on any other than our own exertions, will be vain and illusory. Let us be but united and true to ourselves, and there is no enemy we need fear.

I see no other course for us to pursue than that pointed out by the resolutions. Our interests, our honor, and our safety, require it to be adopted. I am aware that the alarm of war will be rung though the country. I know full well the pains that will be taken to impress an opinion upon our fellow-citizens that we are the friends of war. This we cannot help: the danger with which our country is threatened, will not permit us to shrink from the discharge of our duty, let the consequences to ourselves be what they may. Let me ask you, with my honorable friend from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) what stronger evidence can we give you of the sincerity of our intentions than the resolutions themselves? So far from cramping, or diminishing, the power of gentlemen opposed to us, in a crisis like the present, we only offer to strengthen their own hands. Had the advice of an honorable gentleman near me (Mr. MORRIS) been listened to, when you were disbanding your army, this crisis would not have happened. Had you then posted at the Natchez, as he recommended, a thousand soldiers, the navigation of the Mississippi would not now have been interrupted. He foretold you what would happen, and his prediction has been literally fulfilled.

There is but one fault I find with these resolutions, which is, they do not go far enough. If I could obtain a second, I would move an amendment explicitly authorizing the taking possession of both the Floridas as well as the island of New Orleans. In one respect I entirely accord with the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) and I admire the manly and decisive tone in which he has spoken upon this subject. We both agree that the Floridas must be attached to the United States; but we differ in point of time. The violent aggression committed upon our rights, and the extent of the danger with which we are threatened, in my humble opinion, would amply justify our taking possession of them immediately. Look at the relative situation of Georgia, the Mississippi Territory, and the Floridas, and it will require very little of the spirit of prophecy to foretell that we shall, ere long, be compelled to possess ourselves of them in our own defence. There is but an imaginary line running between them: let the French be but once settled along that line, and they will have the whole of your Southern States at their mercy. Unhappily, there is an inveterate enemy in the very bosom of those States. You might as well attempt to stop the course of the plague, as to arrest the subtle and dangerous spirit they would, the moment it suited their interests, let loose among the helots of that country. Then you would have lighted up there a domestic war, which could only be extinguished in the blood of your citizens. But I cannot agree with the same gentleman from Georgia, when he says, that the French, if they were landed even in hostile array upon our shores, would soon forget their enmity to us, and marrying with our females become our fellow-citizens. The French never forget to love their own country. How many instances did we see of this national character even among the royalists who were driven out of France during the revolutionary convulsion? Did their hearts ever refuse to palpitate with joy when the news of a brilliant victory obtained by their countrymen was announced to them, because it was achieved under the auspices of their persecutors? No, sir; they may act over again the rape of the Sabines, but they will form no other connexion with our fair countrywomen.

We have received many and repeated assurances from honorable gentlemen on this floor, who represent those States most immediately affected, that their constituents are perfectly satisfied with what has been done by the Government in their behalf. They ought, it is true, to be better acquainted than we can be, with the wishes of the people among whom they live, and who have selected them as the guardians of their rights. But I think they will find themselves mistaken. Is it possible that half a million of people will contentedly submit to be cut off from all communication with the rest of the world during the progress of perhaps a tedious negotiation? No, sir. Such is the pressure of their wrongs; so ruinous is the aggression, they cannot submit; they must, they will—nay, I had almost said, they ought to redress themselves. The serpent which has coiled itself at the very portal of their fair mansion must be destroyed. They will have neither France or Spain to guard the fruit of their delightful garden. They know full well the importance of New Orleans; they already consider that port as the Thermopylæ of their country. It is there they will and ought to make a stand in defence of their liberties, and I pray to God that their struggles may be crowned with victory.

Mr. WRIGHT.—When the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ross) was about to introduce his resolutions, after making very voluminous prefatory remarks, he touched on ground that was conceived to be forbidden, and was, therefore, called to order; and that the subject of order might be decided, without the disclosure of that which we conceived ourselves bound to conceal, a motion was made and seconded to shut the doors, which by a rule of the Senate, was therefore a matter of course, and his resolutions were not then submitted. Afterwards, on the day he presented them, he introduced himself by remarking, that on his previous attempt to present his resolutions, he had been called to order, and stopped from proceeding by a new mode, that of shutting the doors, and insinuated that the Senate wished to avoid a public discussion of his resolutions, and to conceal from the people what they ought to know; that we were afraid of the influence of his arguments on the public mind, when he well knew we wished only to conceal what we felt ourselves in honor bound not to reveal. But if he himself did not wish to conceal the truth, why did he not inform the House, or rather the public, for whom his speech was intended, that while the doors were shut, it had been determined "so far as related to the subject on which he had been called to order, that it must not be touched on," and that a seal of secrecy had been fixed on his lips? Did he suppose we would suffer his unfounded insinuations to pass unanswered? Or did he feel himself justified in the suppression of this fact, because its relation would have exculpated himself? The solution of this question must rest with him; but thus, inauspiciously, he presents himself in the opening of this business; and as we pursue him, we shall find him incorrect in his premises, or illogical in his conclusions, and more impolitic than either. Instead of endeavoring to support the measures of the Administration, and to cultivate the arts of peace, he is attempting to excite the Western people to revolt against the Government, by a seditious appeal to their passions, and to sound the trumpet of war in their ears, by a speech highly inflated with immature wrath, and rash declamation against the Spanish Government.

1st. That they had captured our vessels, and imprisoned our seamen.

2d. That they had permitted the French to fit out privateers in their ports to cruise against our commerce.

3d. That they had permitted French Consuls in Spanish ports to condemn our vessels captured by French cruisers.

4th. That they had obstructed our navigation of the Mississippi, and denied us the right of deposit at New Orleans; and to crown the whole, had insultingly issued proclamation upon proclamation, interdicting the exercise of these rights.

The gentleman, however, not content with this philippic against the Spanish Government, rashly charges our own Government with a total neglect of and criminal apathy to, the interests of the Western people. That no nation, either ancient or modern, had ever suffered such indignities, and that our Executive had taken no steps to redress the injury—not a soldier to assert our rights—not a soldier to avenge our wrongs; that the Western people would not—that they ought not to submit to it, but ought immediately to take possession of the mouth of the Mississippi, and for that purpose he submitted his resolutions, now before us.

In considering this subject, he would endeavor to give such an answer to the several parts of the gentleman's observations as appears to him to deserve attention, as well as of those of the gentlemen who have followed him on the same side. He would take up the subject in the gentleman's own order.

1st. That the Spaniards had captured our vessels, and imprisoned our seamen. Of this there was no doubt.

2d. That they had permitted the French to fit out privateers in their ports to cruise against our commerce. This was also admitted.

3d. That they had permitted French Consuls in Spanish ports to condemn our vessels taken by French cruisers. This was not denied.

But he asked the honorable gentleman, if Spain has refused to make us compensation for the spoiliations committed on our commerce, by her own subjects? He asked if Spain could avoid the acts committed by the citizens of France in her ports, when she herself had been constrained to sue for peace, and to accept it, on such terms as France inclined to impose? And he asked, if these aggressions did not happen during the late Administration, when the gentleman and his friends were in full power; and whether it was then proposed to redress them by the sword? These things are well known, and that our Minister at Madrid was then charged to sue for redress for these aggressions, and that they were all in train of adjustment, before the present Administration came into power; and he asked, if we have it not now entirely in our power to settle the spoiliations on our commerce by the subjects of Spain, in the same manner that former Administrations have thought just and honorable, in like cases? And whether we have it not in our power to settle the aggressions of French citizens, in the ports of Spain, for fitting out privateers, and condemning our vessels by French Consuls, upon the principles of strict morality, if not on the more defined principles of the law of nations?

These complaints ought, therefore, to have been out of the question, and ought not now to have been brought forward to foment the difference between the two nations; but were no doubt purposely intended to sour the American mind against Spain, and to prepare* it to act intemperately on the present occasion.

4th. That they had obstructed our navigation of the Mississippi. This he denied. But that the Intendant at New Orleans has put in force the law of Spain, interdicting the commerce of all nations with the Spaniards at New Orleans, and that he had construed it to prohibit our right of deposit there, he admitted; but that his construction of that law is by the authority of Spain, he did not believe; and our right being secured by treaty, must be paramount to that law.

That all America would unite in asserting our right of deposit, secured to us by the solemnity of a treaty, he had no doubt, nor had he ever heard any gentleman of either House express one; on the contrary, they had unequivocally declared their opinion, that the right was all important, and ought to be secured at all hazard; but as to the means of doing this, gentlemen widely differed. He, for his part, felt it due to Spain; he felt it due to our national character to know, whether the act was authorized by the Spanish Government, or justified by them, before he could ascribe it to them; and in this he was governed by the letter and the spirit of the law of nations, and also by the spirit of our own Government.

But, sir, our own Government is charged with a want of sensibility to the sufferings, and a total neglect of the violated rights of the Western people, but how justly, the public will decide, on a candid review of their conduct. The moment the President obtained the information of this act of the Intendant at New Orleans, in arresting our right of deposit at that place, he applied to the Marquis de Casa Yrujo, the Minister of Spain, resident near the Government of the United States, who gave him the most positive assurances that he had no knowledge of the subject that would induce him to suppose that His Catholic Majesty had any intention to violate the treaty, by which that right had been secured; and gave every assurance of His Majesty's friendly disposition towards the United States: he at the same time sent despatches to his own Government on the subject; and in his honest zeal for peace between the two nations, immediately despatched a boat to the Intendant at New Orleans; and also sent despatches to the Governor at Havana. He also assured our Government that the Intendant, and the Governor at New Orleans, differed in the construction of the orders given to the Intendant by the Spanish Government, which were, "to put in force the law heretofore in operation in the Spanish territory, prohibiting all kind of commerce with all nations, with that province," which had been suspended during the late war, by virtue of which, the Intendant, (although not a word was said about prohibiting our deposit at New Orleans,) thought himself bound to prohibit the citizens of the United States from contracting with the Spanish merchants at New Orleans, for the storage of their goods at that place, which had been secured by treaty.

The President immediately gave it in charge to our Ministers at Madrid and at Paris, to inquire into the aggression, and whether it was done by the authority of either of those Courts. He also inquired of the Minister of France, Mr. Pichon, resident near the United States, whether he could give any information on that subject, as it became at least equivocal in whom the territorial right of New Orleans then was; and therefore questionable whether the Intendant might not be acting under the authority of France; and here also we received assurances of the most friendly disposition, and that the Intendant was not acting by the authority of France.

These were the natural, the legitimate, and indeed the only measures that the President could adopt, till the meeting of Congress. No sooner had Congress convened, than he officially informed us of this aggression on our rights, and was so much alive to the western interest, that he immediately after proposed sending James Monroe, Esq., a special Envoy, to be united with our Minister at Paris or at Madrid, as the case might require, to place our western interests on the most secure basis; who, going immediately from the United States, charged with our sensibilities on this recent violation of this invaluable right, would show that we were not only alive to the subject, but very much in earnest, and would furnish the best founded hopes of success. This Minister had been approved of, and was now on his way. This, sir, had been the conduct of the Executive.

But we are told that we have not a soldier to assert our rights, not a soldier to avenge our wrongs; and this also is a charge against the Executive. What, sir! has the gentleman forgot that the President has no right to raise a single soldier? Has he forgot that the power of declaring war is vested in Congress alone? No, sir; these things he well knew, and that the President had done everything he was authorized to do, and that both Houses of Congress had approved of every step he had taken. But, sir, it is not difficult to account for gentlemen's extraordinary sensibility to the violated rights of the western people, or their pretended warmth and zeal to avenge their wrongs; it is all to be found in the political history of the times. It is with a design to stir up the western people to a belief that the Government is insensible to their sufferings, and inattentive to their interests; it is with a view to a revolution in the political opinions of the western people, but which they will see too plainly, to be beguiled from their path of political rectitude; and the division in this case will show it to be a party question, particularly when it is known that every republican member of both Houses of Congress, even those from the western country, approve of the pacific measures that have been adopted.

We are told that no nation, either ancient or modern, had ever suffered such indignities, and we are now emphatically called on to avenge them by the sword, without asking for redress. Can this be right? No, sir; the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. CLINTON) yesterday proved, by a train of arguments not to be resisted, that it had been the practice and usage of the nations of Europe, to endeavor to settle their differences, first, by negotiation, and not to appeal to arms till redress had been denied; and he would now show, by the law of nations, that the act of the Intendant is not to be ascribed to the Spanish Government, unless done by their authority or approbation, and that if the act had been done by authority, it would be violative of both the precepts and practice of our own nation to avenge it by the sword, till negotiation had been tried in vain. To the first point, he would show, by Vattel, 252, sec. 73, "That as it is impossible for the 'best regulated State, or for the most vigilant and 'absolute Sovereign, to model at his pleasure the 'actions of his subjects, or to confine them to an 'exact obedience, it would be unjust to impute 'to the Sovereign the faults of his subjects; we 'ought not to say we have received an injury 'from a nation, because we have received it from 'one of its members." Again, sec. 74: "But if 'a nation approves the act committed by a citizen, it makes the act its own, and the offence 'ought then to be attributed to the nation."

But the honorable gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WELLS) tells us, that, to excuse Spain from the act of the Intendant, we ought to prove that the King of Spain did not authorize it. What, are we to prove a negative? He presumed not; but if we have recourse to the evidence in the case, which is all that time and circumstances will admit, we shall have no doubt on this subject.

The Spanish Minister tells us, it is not by the authority of Spain. The French Minister tells us, it is not by the authority of France. The Governor at New Orleans says, it is by no authority; but a misconception of the Intendant's order. And the order of the Intendant itself, shows, that it is to put in operation a law interdicting the right of all nations to trade, barter, or commerce with the Spaniards in that province, without mentioning our fight of deposit, secured to us by treaty, posterior and paramount to the law, which must be satisfactory, (being the best, nay, the only evidence to be now expected,) that the act is without authority.

Yesterday we were told by the honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) that there was a private letter in town from New Orleans, "that the act was by the authority of France." To-day he presumed that was given up, as his honorable colleague (Mr. WELLS) tells us that he understands the President has received a letter on this subject, "avowing the authority of Spain to do the act." This he conceived equally incorrect. Can it be believed, sir, that the Executive can be in possession of a document of such importance, and, while we are acting on the subject, secrete it from us? No, sir, it would be to make him an accessory; it is impossible—it cannot be true. There is then no evidence that it is the act of Spain, unless we substitute our inclinations for evidence, and thus violate the law of nations, by unjustly ascribing it to her. This, he trusted, would not be done. But, sir, if it had been done by her authority, still he should insist, that it would not only be contrary to the practice and usage of the nations of Europe, to draw the sword of vindictive justice, without a previous attempt at negotiation, as was yesterday proved by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLINTON,) but highly repugnant to the milder precepts and principles of our own nation. And, as he did not wish to cross the Atlantic for authorities, having never been attached to the precepts or practices of kings or princes, or an admirer of the precedents of the Old World, he would leave them on the ground upon which they were placed by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLINTON,) and confine himself to the history of our own Government, and to the principles and practices of our own WASHINGTON. Disregarding the maxims of despots, he would recur to the archives of our own short, though very important political history; and to the salutary principles of our own free Government; from whence he would prove that we ought never to appeal to the sword—that scourge of nations—that "ultima ratio regum," but from dire necessity.

He would begin with our own political history, even before we had an independent existence, in order to correct the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) who yesterday told us that when we were colonies, no sooner had Great Britain violated our rights, than we appealed to the sword. Sir, he asked, if America did not then by petition humble herself at the foot of the throne? Did she not address petition upon petition to the British monarch? Nay, he asked, if she did not, by her repeated remonstrances, drain the cup of humiliation to its dregs, in her supplications but for justice? Nor did we draw the sword until every effort had been tried in vain; nor then till compelled to act on the defensive. Then, too, everything dear to us and to posterity was in issue—then were we called on to resist the treasonable claim of the British Parliament, to tax us, in all cases, without our consent, which they were about to enforce by the sword. This was not the partial invasion of a minor right; it was a vital stab at liberty itself. He asked, if by our temperate supplications our cause was injured, or if our confidence did not increase with our moderation, whereby we were enabled to secure by the sword what had been denied to our supplications; and whereby our virtuous struggle was crowned with independence?

Again. No sooner had Great Britain acknowledged us independent, whereby we had taken rank among the nations of the earth, than she violated the compact that gave us our political existence, even while we lay in swaddling clothes—in the cradle—in the infancy of our Government. Did she not take away our negroes? Did she not keep possession of our western posts? Did not Lord Dorchester excite the Indians with the tomahawk and scalping knife to massacre our peaceable frontier inhabitants, of all ages, sexes, and conditions? Did she not capture our vessels and impress our seamen? What then, I ask, was the conduct of the nation? Who then presided in her councils? Was it not WASHINGTON? Did he appeal to arms? No, sir; he sent a Minister to sue for redress, as has been done upon the present occasion. Were not the aggressions then much greater than the present? and will it be said that WASHINGTON was not a faithful guardian of the national interest—of the national honor? and were not the injuries redressed by the treaty of 1794 to the satisfaction of the councils of the nation?

Again. Did not Spain commit spoliations on our commerce and imprison our seamen? Did not WASHINGTON then preside? Did he appeal to arms? No, sir, he sent a Minister to sue for redress, as has been done upon the present occasion; and were not the injuries redressed by the treaty of 1795?

Again. Did not France capture our vessels and imprison our seamen? Did not WASHINGTON then preside? Did he appeal to arms? No, sir, he sent Ministers to sue for redress. Were not these Ministers rejected? and thus insult added to injury; did he then appeal to arms? No, sir, Mr. Adams then came into the Administration. Did he appeal to arms? No, sir, he sent a new set of Ministers, who were received, and who made the memorable treaty which was ratified by Mr. Adams, in February, 1801.

Again. Did not Spain capture our vessels and imprison our seamen? Did she not permit the French to fit out privateers in her ports to cruise against our commerce? Did she not permit French Consuls to condemn our vessels in her ports? Then Mr. Adams, who presided in our councils, sent a Minister to negotiate, and these aggressions are now in a happy train of adjustment, and there is little doubt will be settled on just and moral principles.

Thus, sir, you see what has been the practice and usage of the United States since they have been an independent nation, and that too under the imposing auspices of a WASHINGTON. He would now show that, so tenacious had been the Government to cultivate the arts of peace, she had guarded it in her Constitution, and ingrafted the principles in her treaties. By the Constitution, the power of declaring war is vested in Congress, and not in the President, lest the caprice of an individual might commit the peace of the nation.

By the treaty with Prussia, made under the auspices of the immortal FRANKLIN, in 1785, the great principle was first established, that in case of a war, neither captures nor reprisals shall be made. It is stipulated in the 23d article, "that, in case of a war between the two nations, all merchant vessels employed in exchanging the products of different places, and thereby rendering the necessities, conveniences, and comforts of human life more easy to be obtained, and more general, shall be allowed to pass free and unmolested; and neither of the contracting Powers shall grant or issue any commission to any private armed vessel to take or destroy such trading vessels, or interrupt such commerce." By the treaty with Great Britain, in 1794, it is stipulated "that no reprisals shall be made for spoliations till an attested statement of the damages is presented, and justice demanded and refused, or unreasonably delayed." By the treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, article eighth, and by the treaty with the Delaware nation of Indians, article fourth, it is expressly stipulated "that their nation shall not avenge the wrongs committed by the citizens of the contracting parties, but that the offenders shall have an impartial trial, and the peace of the nations be preserved." So far is our peace secured by the stipulations in treaties; and he would next show that it had been established as a principle, to preserve the peace of the nation, and to regulate its equanimity; that where we had a treaty with one nation, we are bound to treat all nations in like manner, although we have no treaty to that purpose. (See the letter of General WASHINGTON, dated 5th September, 1793, to G. Hammond, Esq., in the 2d vol. laws of the United States, 493.) "We are bound by our treaties with three of the belligerent nations, by all means in our power, to protect and defend their vessels and effects in our ports or waters, or on the seas near our shores, and to recover and restore the same to the right owners when taken from them. If all the means in our power are used, and fail in their effect, we are not bound by our treaties with those nations to make compensation."

"Though we have no similar treaty with Great Britain, yet we should use towards that nation the same rule which, under this article, was to govern us with the other nations; and even to extend it to captures made on the high seas, and brought into our ports, if done by vessels that had been armed within them."

Thus, sir, had it been shown what had been the practice and usage of foreign nations; and thus had he shown what had been the practice and usage of our own nation in the cases that had occurred during our short history, and that all nations are entitled to equal justice; and all these cases have occurred under the venerated WASHINGTON, except the memorable French *Federal treaty under Mr. Adams, in February, 1801. And yet we were yesterday told by the Hon. Mr. WHITE, "that WASHINGTON would have borne no such insults." No, sir; that he believed, not without seeking redress; but whether in a peaceable, legitimate manner, as has been pursued upon the present occasion, or by the sword, as is now proposed, from what has been already shown, there can be no question. But the same gentleman, (Mr. WHITE,) after charging France with this violation of our rights, in the fervor of his mind, exclaimed, "If this be peace, God give us war!"—which God forbid, as every good man in the nation must deprecate war. WASHINGTON, however renowned in war, was certainly the friend of peace, and very much contributed to the establishment of our national character, "to prefer the pacific olive to the bloody laurel"—a character too dear to us to be now sullied by an unexampled departure from its Christian principles, or ever to be sacrificed on the altars of vengeance against any particular nation.

* Federal, it is presumed, because every republican Senator voted against it.

Mississippi Question.

SENATE.

But some gentlemen speak of a war, on this occasion, with seeming pleasure, as necessarily leading to a connexion with Great Britain, and thereby drawing us into the vortex of European politics and perpetual war. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross,) and the honorable gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WHITE,) have both declared that we ought to take immediate possession of the mouth of the Mississippi, predicated their arguments on the violation of our rights and the magnitude of the subject. The Hon. Mr. WELLS has gone further, and declared that he was for taking possession of New Orleans at all events, whether the act complained of was authorized or unauthorized; that the possession of that place was of such importance that we ought to possess it; and after telling us (but with a bad grace) that there is no reliance on the faith of treaties, and after reprobating what he called the profligate doctrine of the nations of Europe, "that treaties were no longer binding than it was their interest to respect them," advises us to adopt that infamous principle by taking immediate possession of New Orleans, supposed to be the property of France, who had not offended; that if France once gets foothold there, it will be too late. And although it is admitted that France has done us no injury, yet are we pressed to violate the faith of our treaty with that nation by taking possession of her territory; that nothing short of the possession of terra firma can secure us in the free navigation of the Mississippi. Thus are we invited, by the lure of interest, to commit the character of the nation, in violation of every moral principle, and contrary to the law of nations.

Vattel, 150, sec. 104, tells us "that the end of war must be lawful, to legitimate means; that the cause must be just; that one nation is not allowed to attack another for the purpose of aggrandizement; this is the same as if a private person should endeavor to enrich himself by seizing the wealth of another." Again, Vattel, 349, sec. 220, says, "The faith of treaties is holy and sacred between the nations, whose safety and repose it secures; and if people would not be wanting to themselves, infamy would be the share of him who violates his faith." And if it be the practice of the nations of Europe to disregard their treaties, he hoped we should not copy their vices, but that it might be confined to them; it was so demoralizing an idea, that he hoped it would never again be advocated on that floor; sure he was it could not meet, as it did not merit, the approbation of the nation. He wished for peace with all nations, and should therefore always observe the most exact and inviolable fidelity in the execution of the treaties between us and them. He, for his part, had no foreign attachments, no national feelings but those of an American; no rule but the law of nations and the existing treaties; and, however bad the bargain, they should rule his conduct, as the only sure means to preserve the peace of the nation, so much the desire of every good man; war, he conceived, justifiable only in self defence.

But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. Ross) tells us, that a right so important ought not to be held by a tenure so precarious. What better security can a nation exact to secure the enjoyment of her rights with foreign nations? Does he expect she will give us hostages? He presumed not. Treaties are the legitimate compacts to bind nations to each other; they are such as are known to the law of nations, by which are secured, in our foreign relations, our most important rights; and, he trusted, would be always so respected by all honest men, as to afford the utmost security; and he hoped that all infractors of them might be brought to condign punishment.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. J. MASON) said he was not for war; that these resolutions did not propose war. Would the gentleman consider it as war if a foreign army should land at Boston? Would he believe the herald that should proclaim that fifty thousand men, with arms in their hands, and with military equipage, who had landed in the city, had come only on a friendly visit? He presumed not! Sir, these resolutions are more than a declaration of war, they carry the war into actual effect, whereas the declaration only authorizes it; to his mind they presented the question of peace or war. We have been told that the Western people would take up arms to possess themselves of the right, or would throw themselves into the arms of a foreign Power, as they could not subsist without it. No, sir; there is not a good citizen in that country that would abandon his invaluable rights of a freeman, or the title of an American citizen, to be the subject of any nation upon earth; nor did he think it possible to alienate their affections from their own Government, or to shake their confidence in the present Administration; and, although the Administration is charged with indifference to their interest, they will not believe it; they know that the steps that have been heretofore taken in all past cases of our violated rights, have, with promptness, been taken in this case; they know that a Minister has been sent; and they well know that eighty thousand militia have been put in requisition, and arsenals established in that country, and a number of gun-boats ordered to be built for the protection of their commerce in the Mississippi: with this they ought, and will be satisfied, as they expect but equal justice with the other parts of the Union; and this they may with certainty expect. It has been emphatically asked, what would be our conduct if the Chesapeake was blockaded? He said, the same as if the Mississippi was blockaded—but that was not the case. He, for his part, should never be influenced by geographical distinctions; every part of the Union was alike entitled to the protection of Government, and should alike have his support in all similar cases. He did not believe the insinuation, that there was a spirit of sedition in that country that could be fanned into a flame against the Government. They well knew the attention that has been used from the earliest period of our Government to secure the navigation of the river Mississippi, by the treaty that secured us our independence, and gave us existence as a nation; in the eighth article of that treaty, the freedom of the navigation of the Mississippi was secured, even before the Western country was fairly explored, or had a name; that, afterwards, by the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real, in the twenty-second article thereof, the freedom of the navigation of the river, and also the right of deposit at New Orleans, for three years, was secured; and afterwards there, or at such equivalent place, on the banks of the Mississippi, as the King of Spain should assign. But it would seem, from the arguments of the gentlemen who press us to go to war, that these rights were now proposed to be abandoned, although every step that the nation could take, consistent with good faith, the law of nations, the practices of foreign nations, and of our own nation, in like cases, have been taken.

But the magnitude of this subject has been played off, with vast address, by honorable gentlemen on this occasion. One tells us it will take two hundred and fifty ships, of two hundred and fifty tons burden each, to export the products of the Western people that come down the Mississippi. Another tells us that their exports are upwards of four millions of dollars; and a third, that it will ruin five hundred thousand citizens, whose property is embargoed by the suspension of the right of deposit. And this they press as if they intended the magnitude of the object as an argument to influence the decision of the principle upon which we were to decide the question. He, for his part, admitted the importance of the right of deposit, and that it ought, at all hazard, to be secured. He saw, with great pleasure, the rising greatness of the Western country, which was to be ascribed to the long peace and prosperity of the nation; but he could not admit the gentlemen's statements, either as to the quantity of produce to be exported, or the consequent quantity of ships it would take to export them. He could not tell where the gentlemen had obtained the data from which they had made their estimates; but he was sure it was not from the official documents on the subject, to which he should take the liberty to refer, to correct them; the correctness of which could not be questioned. The whole exports, from the official report last year, were $71,957,144. The part that is foreign of that, is $35,774,971; that of the produce of the United States, is $36,182,141. The exports from the Mississippi, last year, were $1,095,412; and not four millions, as has been stated; so that, however important it was, it was far below the gentlemen's statement; who are so zealous for the interest of that country, as to have lost sight of every other part of the Union; and, indeed, to have overlooked the real interest of that part they affect to have so much at heart. They tell us that all their property is now embargoed. But, sir, he asked, would a war relieve it? and would it not embargo the other thirty-five millions of our productions, and greatly distress 5,500,000 citizens? And, instead of securing to the Western people the immediate use of the right of deposit, would most certainly deprive them altogether of the navigation of the Mississippi, and thus involve all in distress, without relieving that part, but more severely injuring it. He wished every member of that country was present; he was satisfied they would be opposed to it themselves. It is well known that the Spaniards have a number of gun-boats at New Orleans, and can entirely command the navigation of the river at that place. But, sir, it has been, and he thought cruelly, insinuated, that the Western people will throw themselves into the arms of a foreign Power; but this they would consider as a libel against their political integrity, and defeat the gentlemen's object. They well knew that the Atlantic States held the key of the Mississippi, that a single frigate could block it up and compel the Spaniards above to do them justice, by the influence of their own safety in the case. He would beg leave to refer to the official valedictory address of General WASHINGTON, which is highly authoritative on this subject, and leave it with the Western people to make the application. He tells us that—

"The unity of government, which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, of your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty you so highly prize. But it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth. As this is the point in your political fortress, against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively, though covertly and secretly directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union, to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immoveable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together its various parts." Again: "The East, in its intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communication, by land and water, will, more and more, find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies for its growth and comfort; and, what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must, of necessity, owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight and influence of the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interests as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connexion with any foreign Power, must be intrinsically precarious." Again: "In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations, Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western; whence, designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart-burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other, those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our Western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen in the negotiations by the Executive, and by the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event, throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them, of a policy in the General Government, and in the Atlantic States, unfriendly to their interests, in regard to the Mississippi; they have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties; that with Great Britain, and that with Spain; which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely, for the preservation of these advantages, on the Union, by which they were procured? Will they not, henceforth, be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren, and connect them with aliens?"

These, sir, are the sentiments of the venerated WASHINGTON, whom the gentlemen are forever dragging from his tomb to degrade, as an authority for their evil measures, or as a cloak for their sinister designs; but whom they will not respect upon this topic. At the time of the formation of our Constitution, this patriot witnessed the difficulty of uniting in one common compact so different and so distant interests; and with a prophetic spirit has foretold what is now attempted. This advice appears to have been written by the pen of wisdom and the finger of love, and, he hoped, would be forever imprinted on the heart of every real American; that its practical utility on the present occasion, may more deeply impress it, and that it may be as lasting as the archives in which it is recorded. How different is this advice from that of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross.) WASHINGTON advises peace and concord; the other, war and insurrection. WASHINGTON advises us to preserve the Union, as the rock of our political salvation; the other says, the Western people ought to dissolve it, and act for themselves. WASHINGTON tells us that disunion is the rock on which the bark of the Republic will be shipwrecked; the other is the pilot that wishes to dash us on this rock. WASHINGTON tells us that the geographical distinction of the East, and of the West, of the Atlantic, and of the South, are the engines that our internal and external enemies will use to disunite us; the other, the internal enemy to put this engine in motion.

Last year we were told that if we repealed the Judiciary law, the Eastern States would separate from the Union; now we are told that if we do not go to war, the western people will separate from us and will throw themselves in the arms of a foreign Power. And what is the expedient the gentleman advises us to adopt, to remedy the evil? Nothing less than treason against the United States, and treason against our own political opinions! The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross,) in the plenitude of his goodness, tells us, "that as we have neither inclination nor understanding to conduct the affairs of Government as we ought, that if we will but let him conduct it agreeably to his better judgment, that all his friends, in both Houses of Congress, and out of doors, should unite in supporting the measures of the Government." This, sir, is a wonderful species of friendship and condescension; it is in fact an humble proposition to exercise the functions of President of the United States; and is it possible he can expect we should revoke our confidence from the man the people had in their wisdom selected to execute these high and important functions, and repose it in him whom the people had dismissed from the execution of all political functions? This would be to prostrate the great elective principle, the palladium of our political rights, the very soul of our Constitution; and is such an evidence of his modesty, that he hoped it would become proverbial. Could we consent to this violation of our duty to the nation, what would be the consequence? War, the scourge, the curse of nations. And who is it, sir, that wishes it? Both the gentlemen from Delaware have told us, "that they feel themselves authorized 'by the opinion of the Legislature of their State, 'in advocating the present measures of war.'" He, for his part, was happy to act agreeably to the sense of his own, and many other States, who have expressed their entire confidence in the present Administration, and their full approbation of the pacific measures that had been adopted. Do the farmers wish a war?—No. Do the merchants wish a war?—No. Do any description of citizens wish a war?—No! And he asked the honorable gentlemen from Delaware, if the conscientious, the scrupulous Quaker, the pious, the pacific Methodist, the meek, the virtuous Nicholite (so many of whom reside in their State) wish for the effusion of human blood, or the destruction of the human race? He presumed not; and that they would give such evidence of it, as the Legislature of that State would not admire; and prove that the mild spirit of Christianity, which they professed, which breathes peace and good will among the sons of men, was more than a simple profession. He believed there were none who wished for war, but the few who sickened at the justly economic character of the present Administration, and who were desirous to create expenses, to drain the Treasury, interrupt the rapid discharge of our public debt, and to coerce new taxes, to jeopardize that character, and to take that chance, as their last forlorn hope, to revive the spark of their extinguished popularity; but he believed every real friend to the peace and prosperity of the nation would be pleased at their disappointment.

Having nearly exhausted himself, he feared he had trespassed too long on the patience of the House, he would therefore very briefly conclude, with a few remarks on the resolutions themselves.

1st. "That the United States have an indisputable right to the free navigation of the Mississipppi, and to a convenient place of deposit for their goods and merchandise in the island of New Orleans." This is not the fact, the right is at New Orleans for three years, which have passed; and then at that place, or at such other place as the King of Spain may assign on the banks of the Mississippi; therefore, that resolution was inadmissible.

2d. "That the infraction of such their unquestionable right, is an aggression hostile to their interest and their honor." This is no infraction of our treaty, unless done by the authority of Spain, of which we have no evidence.

3d. "That it does not comport with the dignity of the United States, to hold a right so important by a tenure so precarious." The right is secured by treaty, the most secure tenure that a nation can claim to have its rights secured by, in its foreign relations; as hostages cannot be demanded.

4th. "That it materially concerns such of the American citizens as dwell on the western waters, and is essential to the union, strength, and prosperity of these States, that they obtain complete security for the full and peaceable enjoyment of such their absolute right." This resolution stands explained by the following one, which directs the President to take immediate possession of the territory; as the complete security contemplated: and therefore could not be admitted. The other resolutions are predicated on the foregoing, and are, therefore, inadmissible; he should, therefore, give them his hearty negative, with a view to support the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) which had been proposed by way of amendment, which he considered unexceptionable, and as much to be preferred as peace was preferable to war.

Mr. Ross rose and said, that the propriety of introducing these resolutions became every day more apparent. Since they had been laid on the table, our national councils had taken a new direction, and had assumed a much more promising aspect. Until these resolutions were brought forward, there had been no military preparation; no proposal to detach militia; to build arsenals on the Western waters; to provide armed boats for the protection of our trade on the Mississippi. He was happy in seeing gentlemen on the opposite side pursuing a more vigorous course than they were at first inclined to adopt, and he hoped they would before long consent to take stronger and more effectual measures for the security of what was in hazard.

As he had on a late occasion stated at large his reasons for presenting the resolutions, he would not detain the Senate with a repetition of them, except where they had been misrepresented or distorted during the debate. He could not suppose that any gentleman would intentionally misstate what had been said; but it was certain that sentiments and assertions had been ascribed to him, in the course of this discussion, not warranted by anything he had advanced.

Every gentleman who has spoken in this debate, excepting the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) admits that the Unit ed States have an indisputable right to the free navigation of the river Mississippi, and to a place of deposit in the island of New Orleans. All agree that this right is of immense magnitude and importance to the Western country. All agree that it has been grossly and wantonly violated; and all agree that, unless the right be restored and secured, we must and will go to war. Upon what, then, do we really differ? Upon nothing but the time of acting; whether we shall take measures for immediate restoration and security, or whether we shall abstain from all military preparation, and wait the issue of negotiation. There is no disagreement upon this point; for if negotiation fails, every man who has spoken has pledged himself to declare war.

A number of the objections made against the adoption of measures we have proposed deserve to be noticed.

The honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. CLINTON) had displayed considerable talent and elaborate research into ancient and modern history, showing what had been the practice of nations. He had collected all the objections together, and classed them under three heads. Other gentlemen who had spoken in opposition had taken nearly the same ground, and made in substance the same objections. He would, therefore, follow the arrangement made by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. CLINTON,) and he was persuaded that it would be easy to show he had in many instances mistaken the most material features of the authorities he had adduced, and more than once misstated the positions which he undertook to refute. He has, however, admitted the magnitude of the right, that it has been violated, and that if negotiation should fail, we must go to war. He has made objections under three heads; this method had the merit of perspicuity, and he would follow it.

1. That it is doubtful whether the infraction is or is not authorized.

2. That negotiation ought, in justice, to precede the employment of force.

3. That reasons of policy dissuade from using force at present, even supposing we have just cause of immediate war.

The first objection had already been amply refuted by the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. MASON,) and the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WHITE.) He would only further remark, that whether authorized or not, is not now very material. If authorized, the temper, the design must certainly be that of an enemy, and you should act accordingly. If unauthorized, seize the culprit and send him home to his master, who will punish him for a breach of duty; let him answer with his head for embroiling two friendly nations who wish to live in peace. Why wait till you can send three thousand miles and inquire whether he had orders or not? He is visibly a wrongdoer; remove him, and protect what he would wrest from you. No man when proceeding on the highway to market, and stopped by his neighbor's servant, would send out into the country to inquire whether his master had authorized the outrage. No, he would punish and remove the aggressor, and proceed on his journey, leaving the circumstance of orders, or no orders, to be settled between himself and the master afterwards. Besides, in this instance, the person inflicting the injury declares he has no right to the country. If so, why make inquiry whether he has orders? No orders could give him authority to interfere with your unquestionable right, where his master pretends to no right himself.

Under this head of aggression and spoliation, the Senator from New York, (Mr. CLINTON,) in a tone and manner little decorous in debate, had declared it to be within his (Mr. Ross's) knowledge, that indemnity had been provided by Spain for the spoliations committed upon our trade, and yet the assertion had been made, that Spain had refused all redress for injuries of that kind; and the gentleman alluded to documents before the Senate, which were under the injunction of secrecy.

Sir, said Mr. Ross, I have seen those documents, and I now repeat and re-assert, that I know nothing to warrant the opinion or belief that Spain will make compensation for all spoliations of our merchants, or for the greater part or mass of them. I certainly never did say that Spain had refused all redress; for it will be recollected by all present, that I expressly stated the other day, the injury done to us by the Spaniards themselves in every place they had found our flag; and that our vessels were carried into their ports by French cruisers, condemned without the semblance of a trial, and our citizens thrown into prison. That, if we took possession of the country on the Mississippi, we should have an ample fund in our hands to compensate all our merchants who had suffered from the conduct of the Spaniards; that the merchants would willingly accept such an advantageous offer; and that otherwise there was no reason to hope that they would all be indemnified. And I now return to that gentleman his own words, that he does know, and must be sensible, from the very documents he has alluded to, that there is little, if any hope, that the great body of injuries and losses sustained by our merchants from the Spaniards in different quarters of the world, and the conduct of the French in Spanish ports, will ever be compensated or paid by Spain, unless in the mode that I had suggested.

The same gentleman had said, that we have no facts respecting Spanish spoliation authenticated and reported to us, and offers this as a further reason for delay and negotiation. The facts of spoliation, and vexatious oppressive conduct towards our merchants, and seamen, as well on the sea as within the jurisdiction of the Spanish Government, both in Europe and America, were so notorious, and of such extent and continuance, that no man could doubt, or deny the aggravated series of outrage and oppression which we had experienced. Although the Executive, or other officers of Government, may not have collected and reported these complaints to this House, yet this forms no excuse for the aggressors, much less a reason why we should abstain from giving attention to them, while considering indignities of another description. But, that the gentleman might never again be able to say that he had met with no authenticated case of spoliation by the Spaniards, he would now produce and read one to the Senate, which had been delivered to him for the purpose of obtaining the aid of our Government to get reparation. The men who had been robbed were industrious inhabitants of the western country, who lived near Pittsburg. They descended the Mississippi with a cargo of flour, and finding but a low market at New Orleans, shipped their flour on board of an American vessel, and after being two or three days at sea, were taken by Spanish vessels, carried into Campeachy, their flour sold, their captain cast into prison, themselves restrained of their liberty; several died in this captivity; and those who returned home had no allowance made to them by the Spaniards for their property thus unjustly captured; and of course they only returned to witness the ruin of their families by a loss of property which they had not the means of paying for, having purchased on credit. There could be no excuse for the capture; these men lived in the interior country, they were cleared out from a Spanish port, in an American vessel: yet all these circumstances could not save them from the rapacity of the Spaniards.

[Here Mr. R. read the protest of several American citizens before Mr. Morton, the American consul at Havana, stating the capture of their vessel, their captivity at Campeachy, the loss of all their property, and that they lived in the western country, from which they had gone down the Ohio with this flour to New Orleans.]*

Mr. R. said here was a case of prodigious hardship and oppression, arising out of the very trade and intercourse which the Spaniards had at last undertaken to obstruct and destroy; and therefore he thought it proper to be brought forward during this discussion, to show the temper and the conduct of these people towards us before they had proceeded to the last extremities.

The second position taken by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLINTON,) and indeed by all who had spoken against the resolutions, amounted to this: That every nation was bound to demand satisfaction for an injury before it employed force for redress; and that a refusal of satisfaction must precede the use of force.

However humane or salutary the general principle might be, certainly it did not hold universally, or to the extent that gentleman contended. No book, no writer of authority, had ever contended that this principle should operate when the essential rights, the well-being, or the peace of the country were exposed to danger; and the rule had no application but to inferior or minor rights of the society, where delay and negotiation might be safely resorted to. No man could say, that this rule would hold where an army was marched to your frontier, or landed upon your territory; or a fleet blockaded your harbors, or demanded contributions from your seaports. Such cases admitted not of negotiation: the intention of the assailant was manifest, the danger imminent, and immediate use of force and hostility unavoidable by the most peaceable nation. It would be said that these were extreme cases, and formed exceptions to the general rule. They certainly demonstrated that the rule was not so general as gentlemen contended for; and when the case at present under consideration is carefully examined, it will be found among those essential and all important rights of the nation, which, when attacked, immediate force should be employed to repel the assailant. In cases of invasion, the mere possession of a small portion of your soil, is not the primary consideration; you are impressed with the approach of further and more serious injury. The hostile intention is manifest, the act such as to leave no doubt, and your right such as can never be abandoned. So here, though there be no actual aggression within the limits of your territory, yet you have a territorial right attached to your soil, constituting its only value, which is directly attacked and destroyed. Of what value is the territory when stripped of this right? Where is your independence? Where is your sovereignty in that country, without the unrestrained exercise of this right? Without it the mere soil is of no value. It is an attribute inseparable from the substance. To attack it, is to attack your very existence, for it is the great artery of the western country, the circulation through which, when stopped, endangers convulsion and political death. The destruction of this right is a greater calamity than a blockade of a seaport, or even a landing on the Atlantic coast. The mischief is incurable. Can it then be said when this vital part of the nation is assailed, you will wait for information of the intent? You will inquire into the motives? You will not employ force to resist the attack, although you may be undone before you can receive an answer? You will hazard convulsion and dissolution, because possibly the aggressor has reasons for the outrage, that you do not yet know? This cannot be wise, it cannot be the course which national honor or safety calls upon us to pursue; because you never can abandon the right now denied and wrested out of your hands; you can no more abandon it, than any other portion of country within your territorial limits, when invaded by an enemy.

But in whose favor is this delay asked? With whom are you going to negotiate for reparation of the injury? Why, with those, who, by their own confession, have no right in the country from which they exclude you. When you inquire of the Court of Spain what has led them to this outrage, they may reply, we know and care nothing about it; that country is no longer ours; we have abandoned all claim to it, and ordered our officers to withdraw. The title is now in another. Will this satisfy you? Will it redress the injury? Where will you go next? Or how long will you wait for an answer to the question of who turned us out of doors and keeps us out? You have the same reasons for a second as for the first delay; and in the meanwhile you are out of actual possession; the wrongdoer is in.

But, sir, we are triumphantly told, that it has been the practice of all civilized nations to negotiate before they go to war. Round assertions, like general rules, are to be received with exceptions and great allowance. I dispute the fact; although my argument does not need this kind of aid; for I am persuaded there is no precedent of an independent nation relying upon negotiation alone, in such circumstances. If you go to books, or to the example of other countries, you will find no dictum of a writer, nor instance of a State, that will justify the course now held by gentlemen on the other side. For whenever the nation has been invaded, its vital interests attacked, its existence drawn into hazard, its essential rights exposed to immediate destruction, every writer and every State will bear you out in resorting, without delay, to the strongest means in your power for repelling the aggressor.

The conduct of the Romans has been more than once mentioned. Their history is handed down to us by themselves, and even in that we shall too often find, that while their ministers of peace were affecting to demand reparation, the Consul had advanced with his eagles to the frontier, and was ready to enter the country where the negotiation was pending; we shall find that they negotiated often and long, when it did not suit them to commence an immediate attack; and the negotiations, especially when at a distance, were protracted, until their armies had been recruited, wars nearer home ended, and everything ready to strike a decisive blow. But you have no instance of negotiation without military preparation, where the Roman territory was invaded, or a Roman treaty violated.

Leaving antiquity, the honorable gentleman (Mr. CLINTON) has adduced and extolled the example of England in modern times, and traced her through many scenes both in negotiation and war. But he did not dwell on her conduct in the beginning of the war of 1756, when all the commerce of France was destroyed by a general sweep, without a previous declaration of war; and yet this was so certainly the case, that the gentleman must well remember it formed a subject of complaint, and was used to protract the negotiation for a general peace in 1763. He has also forgotten their conduct towards the Dutch, during our Revolutionary war; and their late armament against the Danes. His comments also upon the conduct of their Ministry in 1762, were peculiarly unfortunate, because we know that the nation was afterwards actually obliged to declare war against Spain, when she had full notice of their intention, and time to prepare for the attack; whereas, had war been waged when the hostility of Spain and her secret alliance with France were first ascertained, they would have possessed prodigious advantages, which were lost by ineffectual negotiation and delay.

I will not follow the gentleman to Nootka Sound, to the Bay of Honduras, or the Musquito

Shore; but I will at once admit, that in cases of minor rights, spoliation upon commerce in time of war; nay, in all cases that do not involve the well-being, or national independence, negotiation and amicable adjustment should be resorted to; and demand of reparation should precede actual hostility. I will even say, that were the Spaniards to cross the Mississippi at the Falls of St. Anthony, and build a fort on our side of the river, place a garrison in it, and thus actually invade our territory, in my opinion we ought to negotiate and demand explanations before we sent troops to demolish the fort. Although the act would justify the immediate use of force, yet the station is so remote, and of so little importance in the use of it, that friendly means might be safely and wisely resorted to in the first instance.

Quitting Europe, the gentleman exultingly appeals to the usages of our own country, in cases which he alleges were either similar to, or stronger than the present. The name of WASHINGTON is introduced to silence all further dispute on this question! Sir, I reverence the authority of that great man's official conduct. He was the father of his country, the terror of its enemies, and the ornament of human nature. He is now gone to mix with the heroes and sages of other times and nations, in a happier world; but it was easily foreseen that those who seldom agreed with him in his life, would be the first, after his death, to fly for shelter to his example, when overtaken by calamity or misfortune! That man led the armies of his country to victory—to independence. He knew better than any man the interests, the feelings, the dispositions of the people. He witnessed the origin and progress of complaints on both sides respecting the inexecution of the Treaty of Peace between us and Great Britain. We justly reproached them with detention of the western posts, and their refusal to deliver our slaves, as stipulated by treaty; they replied that we did not pay them our old debts. These disputes became the subject of negotiation, under the old Confederation, and we had a Minister in that country who attempted an amicable adjustment. When General WASHINGTON came to the head of our present Government, he sent another Minister to that country, and while he was endeavoring a peaceable accommodation, a storm broke out in France, which soon spread beyond its own boundaries, and involved the neighboring nations in war. The rulers of France, wishing to engage us in their quarrel, sent a Minister to this country with express instructions to embroil us, if possible, in this desolating war. Unfortunately that Minister possessed abilities and a disposition well adapted to such a mission. He landed in a part of our country remote from the seat of Government, and instantly began to issue his commissions to our citizens, not only to equip privateers and plunder the commerce of nations with whom we were at peace, but to enlist men and raise a military force within the United States, for the purpose of attacking the possessions of Spain in Florida. He travelled onward from Charleston towards the seat of Government, making pros-elytes as he advanced, and gaining new adherents at every step of his journey. He was received with acclamations of the liveliest joy in the capital city of this country, and after employing all the soothing arts of fraternization, civic feasts, and public spectacle, he proceeded, as before, with his commissions, and actually insisted upon, and exercised the right of bringing into our ports and selling prizes taken from nations with whom we were at peace. This Minister had the address to seduce many of our citizens to enlist under his banner; and but too many, even of our respectable men in high employment, applauded his conduct and gave his measures a countenance they did not deserve. All ranks seemed pleased with the zeal and the boldness of the Minister's mind, and an union of this country with France in the war seemed inevitable, as no effectual steps had been taken to restrain this wild extravagant condition of things among us. I mention not these events with a wish to hurt the sensibility of any one, for I know that this country was then without experience; we had never before been in the relation of neutrality towards Powers at war, and we entertained a lively affection for France, because she had aided us in the Revolutionary war, and was then as we thought, contending for liberty herself. The respectable men who, led away by their feelings, joined in the frenzy of that time, would not now display such opinions, or enter upon any public act to commit or endanger the peace and honest neutrality of their country.

Very unfortunately, however, we had then here a Minister from Great Britain who was but little inclined to promote good understanding, and who probably transmitted discolored accounts of all that passed from day to day. Things were sufficiently wrong without any exaggeration of their enormity. When these accounts reached England, was it wonderful that they considered war as begun? Was it strange that they should count upon hostility, when the acts of the people assumed but one complexion; when the Government had not taken means to do justice and prevent such injustice; when their ships were sold by their enemies, and every indignity put upon their subjects? Hence, we may trace the orders for spoliations; hence, the talk of Lord Dorchester to the Indians, and the other aggressions on the western frontier, which, however unjustifiable, were not altogether without provocation.

In the meanwhile, the French Minister increased in his activity and boldness of enterprise, under the very eye of our Government; he multiplied his complaints against the Executive, and his caresses and professions upon the people, until, at last, confident in his numbers and support, he set the President at defiance, and threatened an appeal to the people. At that awful crisis of delusion, WASHINGTON came forward, Moses-like, and put himself in the gap between the pestilence and the people. He demanded the Minister's recall; he was recalled; he arrested the hands of our citizens who were armed to plunder in time of peace; he enforced the observation of the rules of justice and neutrality. When these things became known in England, they produced a revocation of the orders to plunder our merchants. But the havoc and destruction had been dreadful; we were highly and justly incensed; the blood of both nations was up; it had scarcely cooled, and was easily roused to be ready for war. If the British had not recalled their orders of November, 1793, we undoubtedly should instantly have gone to war. It would have been unavoidable, nay, absolutely necessary. But when the revocation of those orders was known here, our President considered that our own conduct had not been perfectly regular; there was some cause of complaint against us, in the midst of all the just complaints we had against the British cruisers; there were also old differences, which had created great uneasiness between the two countries. In the recent causes of quarrel, we had been the first in suffering improper acts to be done by a foreign agent within our own territory, which we ought to have prevented as neutrals. Under all these circumstances, being already engaged in an Indian war, he resolved to try negotiation—an Envoy Extraordinary was accordingly sent.

How does all this apply to the present case? There had been old, unsettled differences with England; ours with Spain were settled by the treaty of 1795. There were horrible spoliation upon our trade by Britain, but we had permitted acts towards them with which we were obliged to reproach ourselves. Spain has also spoiled our commerce, and to an immense extent, without provocation. For that, the case of England would say negotiate, and we have actually been negotiating. But had England blockaded your harbors; had she shut out half a million of your people from access to the ocean; had she closed up the Chesapeake or the Delaware, would there have been negotiation? No. You would, you must have had immediate war. Such an invasion of the sovereignty and independence of the country would have left no hesitation in the mind of any man; but, fortunately, as our affairs then stood, we were not obliged to resort to hostilities. The man of high talents who undertook to negotiate, succeeded in forming a treaty between the two countries. Such, however, were the passions of the times, that the negotiator was grossly calumniated. The treaty was opposed by the formidable array of all the artillery of popular opinion, organized in town meetings, played off along the coast from Boston to Charleston, under the direction of the ablest engineer in this country. Public opinion was again shaken, but finally peace was preserved, the treaty went fairly into execution, and even the negotiator was elected their Governor, by the people of his own State, where he presided for a long time, with honor to himself, and infinite advantage to the interests and peace of the society; until at length he retired from public life, leaving an example which will always be useful for imitation, and serve, at the same time, as a severe reproof to those who may materially depart from it.

Our differences and negotiations with England, then, furnished an interesting and serious view of the course we have taken in troublesome times, but certainly do not present anything like the present case. For, although they actually held our western posts, and built a new fort at the foot of the rapids of Miami, yet, we had never been in possession of those posts; we had not purchased the country from the Indians; we had no settlements near it; no great portion of our citizens were obstructed or cut off from the free exercise of their rights; and there were mutual complaints, perhaps mutual injuries, between the parties, which seemed to require negotiation, as the only mode in which they could ever be terminated.

Next comes our difference with Spain. To this it may be answered, briefly, that we made a treaty with that Power; difficulties arose respecting the execution of that treaty; we had not then been in the possession or exercise of the rights claimed under the treaty. The Spaniards delayed and evaded the execution, in a very unjustifiable manner. But the Administration of that day did not rely upon negotiation alone; they ordered troops to the Ohio, and had the Spaniards persisted in their refusal, those troops would have acted decisively, without any new application to the Court of Spain. They saw the approaching storm; they entered upon the execution of the treaty, by running the line, and giving up the posts; and, if the War Office be examined, gentlemen will find that our troops were then so disposed as to fall down the river Mississippi, and act with effect at any moment. It was well known to us that Spain did not act in that business from the mere impulse of her own interests or wishes. She was then, and is still, under the irresistible influence of a powerful neighbor, with whom we at that time had serious differences—she was urged and pushed forward by France; for Spain, until she became thus dependant upon France, has ranked high for her good faith, and, in my opinion, deservedly higher than any other Court in Europe. Slow to promise, she has always fulfilled her engagements with honor, according to the spirit, without cavilling about the words of her treaties. When we were aware of all these things, when there was no absolute refusal, but only delay and evasive excuses about the execution, not about the right, it would not have been wise to precipitate an absolute rupture between the two countries.

The proceedings with France are next adduced. These are fresh in the memory of every one, and need not be repeated. There was no blockade, no denial of egress to the ocean, no invasion, no territorial dismemberment, no attack upon the country which required the immediate use of force. True, they captured your ships, they heaped indignities upon you; but they also alleged that you had first broken the Treaty of Alliance. You negotiated; what else could you do? You had no navy. You could not go in quest of them, and they did not attempt to land on your shores. When their aggressions rose to such a height as to be tolerated no longer, and defensive war was resolved on, what was the conduct of the minority then? Did they come forward and offer their support like the minority now? No, sir, they declared the Administration was blameable; that the French had been provoked; that peace was still attainable by negotiation, and war at all events to be avoided. Look at the debates of that day, and you will discover that many leading men contended that our own Government was altogether in the wrong, and France in the right. Such was the impression abroad, that Talleyrand insultingly boasted of a party in our own country, and threatened us with the fate of Venice; and when the sacred right of embassy was trampled upon, as stated by the honorable gentleman from New York, still the cry at home was negotiate, negotiate! Surely there is very little, if any, resemblance between that case and this. However justifiable a war would have been then, we must have gone abroad to seek our enemy; now he has come to our doors, and stripped us of what is most precious and dear to us as an independent nation.

We are next told, under the third head of objections, that our national debt will be increased by war; that war will be the necessary consequence of the resolutions; that our object is war. Sir, our object is not war, but the attainment of security for a right, without which our Union, our political existence, cannot continue. In seeking this security should war arise, it will be a less evil than insecure and delusive hopes of tranquillity. No doubt war will increase your public debt, but no more nor so much as vain attempts to secure this right another way; and, after failing, you must have a war.

But your merchants will not obtain indemnities for spoliations. Their chance is but precarious now, and would be altogether as great in the way we propose to take.

Seaports will be blockaded, and the Mississippi shut. The first is not probable, and as to the last, all the Western people must be satisfied when they see their country maintaining and asserting their right. The very effort to maintain it will consume a great portion of the resources and afford an extensive market to the aggrieved people, by supplying your military force. The river may as well be shut up completely as be in its present condition.

An honorable gentleman (Mr. WRIGHT) has said, that we may have a place of deposit in our own territory, and navigate the river from thence. The gentleman has not certainly well considered this subject. The nearest point upon our territory is three hundred miles from the sea; the river crooked, the current rapid, the anchorage bad. A favorable wind in one direction of the river, would be adverse at the next bend. Ships could never ascend in any reasonable time, nor could they gain any point on our own territory, when they are forbidden to touch the shore, even to fasten a cable or tow-line. Without the privilege of the shore, the navigation would be impracticable.

The honorable gentleman from New York had advanced a most extraordinary position: that if our adversaries have time to prepare, we also have time to prepare. Yet he resists the resolutions, and proposes no effectual military preparations. While they are busy, we are to be idle—when they make the stroke, we are in our present defenceless state. Next year, we shall be as weak and exposed as now; our commerce equally scattered over the ocean; our seaports as defenceless; our army and navy as weak; and they have then possession of the disputed spot, with an armament to annoy us, and maintain their possession.

The honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE) disclaims all apprehension of disgust, or disaffection among his constituents, or any of the Western people. They were not always in this mild, forbearing temper upon the subject of the Mississippi. It must be in the recollection of that gentleman, that Mr. Genet sent emissaries into Kentucky, distributed commissions there for enlisting men, and raising an army to take New Orleans, and open the navigation of the Mississippi to the Western people. A very gallant and able officer accepted the commission of General on this expedition, and would undoubtedly have executed it, had not the recall of the French Minister, and the failure of the expected resources, defeated the enterprise. What reason was there to suppose they would be more forbearing now? That officer was still alive, and if he was to erect his standard, the consequences could not be very doubtful.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. JACKSON) agrees with us in everything except as to the time of acting. He wishes to make an experiment at negotiation, but admits the magnitude of the dispute, and that it involves the very existence of Georgia and the Southern States. If the late events had happened upon St. Mary's, or if the Savannah had been shut up by the Spaniards, there would have been little doubt of the course that gentleman would have pursued. The news of the aggression and of the aggressors' graves would have reached the seat of Government by the same mail. He would not have waited to inquire by whose orders they came there, or whether they could be negotiated out of Georgia. Although the gentleman disagrees with us as to the time of acting, yet he has very honorably pledged himself for the ultimate result, should negotiation fail; and while it is impossible to agree with what he has said respecting the ordinary force of the country driving the new occupants from their fastnesses and forts in the marshes of Florida or New Orleans, yet, sir, there can be no doubt that the spirit which disdains to think of the hazard of such an enterprise, is of the utmost value to our country. For my own part, I have a pleasure in declaring my wish, that the gentleman now lived on the Mississippi, and that he had authority from this Government to act: I should have no doubt of the result, nor of the confidence and universal consent with which he would be supported. But he is certainly too much a soldier not to discern, that previous possession by a powerful enemy will require the labors and blood of a disciplined army, and the delay and skill requisite for the attack of a fortified country.

We come now to consider the resolution offered as a substitute. It is highly gratifying to find that gentlemen are at last inclined to act—to do something like defending the rights of our country. Is there any new shape given to this business by the proposed substitute? We propose fifty thousand militia; they substitute eighty thousand. To do what? Will gentlemen tell us the difference? It is said ours are absolutely imperative; if so, alter them, and give an unqualified discretion. We will agree to it. My own opinion is, that they should be immediately acted upon. If the majority wish for a bare discretionary power, I assent to it. There is no difference except that one set of resolutions puts greater power in the hands of the President than the other. Are gentlemen on the other side afraid to trust the President? Do they think he will abuse this power? Will it hurt the negotiation? Instead of hurting it, our Minister ought to carry this act to Europe with him. He is not yet gone, and it may be sent with him. He would then have more means, and more forcible arguments to urge in his negotiation.

SENATE.

Mississippi Question.

This whole subject was known at the meeting of Congress; yet no step was taken, till our resolutions were proposed. Now gentlemen are willing to do something! They seem willing to give means to a certain extent. Why not amend our resolutions, when their own are but a qualification of ours. We have but seven days to the end of this session. Why dispute about a substitute, when amendments may be made to meet gentlemen's wishes? They agree to go a certain length; then say so, and strike out the rest. Certainly we will go with you as far as you propose, for we have offered to go farther.

But gentlemen say they have full confidence in the negotiation. Be it so. I cannot doubt the assertion of the gentlemen, although I draw a different conclusion from the same facts. But let me present the question in a new shape, not yet offered in this House. We are not deliberating about the right of deposit in New Orleans merely, nor about the island of New Orleans; we are told that we are to look for new and powerful neighbors in Louisiana. What right has Spain to give us these neighbors without consulting us? To change our present security into hazard and uncertainty? I do not believe that Spain has any right to do so. What are the limits of Louisiana? It extends three thousand miles upon your frontier. New Orleans is ceded with it. Then the province of Louisiana and New Orleans lie between the Floridas, and the other Spanish dominions on this continent. It is not difficult to determine who will command and own the Floridas. They must belong to the master of Louisiana and New Orleans. Then the owners possess the lock and key of the whole Western country. There is no entrance or egress but by their leave. They have not only three thousand miles on your frontier in the interior country, but they have the command of your outlet to the ocean, and seven hundred miles of seacoast embracing the finest harbors in North America. This makes them, in fact, masters of the Western world. What will you give them for this enviable dominion? Not territory, for you have none to spare, and they want none. Not commercial privileges—they will not want them, for they will then have enough and to spare. What equivalent have you? What can you offer to men who know the value of such a country? What would this Senate take for the surrender of such an establishment were it ours? Let every Senator ask himself the question, and declare by what rule of estimation his answer would be dictated.

But I know it has been said, and will be said again, that the new French owners will confirm or permit our right of deposit and free navigation of the Mississippi—they will open a free port and give us all we desire. Yes, sir, this would be the unkindest cut of all. I fear much less the enmity of the present possessors, than such neighbors. We shall hold by their courtesy, not by the protection of our own Government. They will permit, but you cannot enforce. They will give us all the advantages we now have and more. But will it be for nothing? Will they ask no return? Have they no ulterior views? No! During this insidious interval, they will be driving rivet after rivet into the iron yoke, which is to gall us and our children. We must go to market through a line of batteries manned by veterans; and return home with our money through a fortified camp. This privilege will be held at their will, and may be withheld whenever their Intendant forbids its further continuance.

No doubt my earnestness may have betrayed me into expressions which were not intended. Every honorable gentleman will therefore consider me as addressing his reason and judgment merely, without meaning to give cause of offence. But I cannot conclude without addressing myself particularly to those Senators who represent the Western States. I entreat them to remember that these resolutions are intended to vest a power which may, or may not be used, as events arise. If events should show, in the recess, that negotiation must fail, what is the President to do? He must call Congress. This will consume time, and the enemy gain immense advantages. Why not put a force at his disposal with which he can strike, with which he can have a pledge for your future well-being? When the Atlantic coast is willing, shall this security be lost by your votes? Are you sure that you will ever again find the same disposition? Can you recall the decisive moment that may happen in a month after our adjournment? Certainly the country may be in such a state that at the next session you will have no such offer as at the present moment. There may be a pressure which would forbid it. Heretofore you have distrusted the Atlantic States; now, when they offer to pledge themselves, meet them and close with the proposal. If the resolutions are too strong, new-model them. If the means are not adequate, propose other and more effectual measures. But as you value the best interests of the Western country, and the union with the Atlantic coast, seize the present occasion of securing it forever. For the present is only a question of how much power the Executive shall have for the attainment of this great end, and no man desirous of the end ought to refuse the necessary means for attaining it. Your voice decides the direction this Senate will take, and I devoutly wish it may be one we shall never repent.

Mr. GOUVERNEUR MORRIS.—Mr. President, I rise with reluctance on the present occasion. The lateness of the hour forbids me to hope for your patient attention. The subject is of great importance, as it relates to other countries, and still greater to our own; yet we must decide on grounds uncertain, because they depend on circumstances not yet arrived. And when we attempt to penetrate into futurity, after exerting the utmost powers of reason, aided by all the lights which experience could acquire, our clearest conceptions are involved in doubt. A thousand things may happen which it is impossible to conjecture, and which will influence the course of events. The wise Governor of all things hath hidden the future from the ken of our feeble understanding. In committing ourselves, therefore, to the examination of what may hereafter arrive, we hazard reputation on contingencies we cannot command. And when events shall be past, we shall be judged by them, and not by the reasons which we may now advance.

There are many subjects which it is not easy to understand, but it is always easy to misrepresent, and when arguments cannot be controverted, it is not difficult to calumniate motives. That which cannot be confuted, may be misstated. The purest intentions may be blackened by malice; and envy will ever foster the foulest imputations. This calumny is among the sore evils of our country. It began with our earliest success in 1778, and has gone on with accelerated velocity and increasing force to the present hour. It is no longer to be checked, nor will it terminate but in that sweep of general destruction, to which it tends with a step as sure as time, and fatal as death. I know that what I utter will be misunderstood, misrepresented, deformed, and distorted; but we must do our duty. This, I believe, is the last scene of my public life; and it shall, like those which preceded it, be performed with candor and truth. Yes, my noble friends, [addressing himself to the Federal Senators near him,] we shall soon part to meet no more. But however separated, and wherever dispersed, we know that we are united by just principle and true sentiment. A sentiment, my country, ever devoted to you; which will expire only with expiring life, and beat in the last pulsation of our hearts.

Mr. President, my object is peace. I could assign many reasons to show that this declaration is sincere. But can it be necessary to give this Senate any other assurance than my word? Notwithstanding the acerbity of temper which results from party strife, gentlemen will believe me on my word. I will not pretend, like my honorable colleague, (Mr. CLINTON,) to describe to you the waste, the ravages, and the horrors of war. I have not the same harmonious periods, nor the same musical tones; neither shall I boast of Christian charity, nor attempt to display that ingenuous glow of benevolence so decorous to the cheek of youth, which gave a vivid tint to every sentence he uttered; and was, if possible, as impressive even as his eloquence. But, though we possess not the same pomp of words, our hearts are not insensible to the woes of humanity. We can feel for the misery of plundered towns, the conflagration of defenceless villages, and the devastation of cultured fields. Turning from these features of general distress, we can enter the abodes of private affliction, and behold the widow weeping, as she traces, in the pledges of connubial affection, the resemblance of him whom she has lost forever. We see the aged matron bending over the ashes of her son. He was her darling; for he was generous and brave, and therefore his spirit led him to the field in defence of his country. We can observe another oppressed with unutterable anguish: condemned to conceal her affection; forced to hide that passion which is at once the torment and delight of life; she learns that those eyes which beamed with sentiment, are closed in death; and his lip, the ruby harbinger of joy, lies pale and cold, the miserable appendage of a mangled corse. Hard, hard indeed, must be that heart which can be insensible to scenes like these, and bold the man who dare present to the Almighty Father a conscience crimsoned with the blood of his children.

Yes, sir, we wish for peace; but how is that blessing to be preserved? I shall here repeat a sentiment I have often had occasion to express. In my opinion, there is nothing worth fighting for, but national honor; for in the national honor is involved the national independence. I know that a State may find itself in such unpropitious circumstances, that prudence may force a wise Government to conceal the sense of indignity. But the insult should be engraven on tablets of brass, with a pencil of steel. And when that time and chance, which happen to all, shall bring forward the favorable moment, then let the avenging arm strike him. It is by avowing and maintaining this stern principle of honor, that peace can be preserved. But let it not be supposed that anything I say has the slightest allusion to the injuries sustained from France, while suffering in the pangs of her Revolution. As soon should I upbraid a sick man for what he might have done in the paroxysms of disease. Nor is this a new sentiment; it was felt and avowed at the time when these wrongs were heaped on us, and I appeal for the proof to the files of your Secretary of State. The destinies of France were then in the hands of monsters. By the decree of Heaven she was broken on the wheel, in the face of the world, to warn mankind of her folly and madness. But these scenes have passed away. On the throne of the Bourbons is now seated the first of the Gallic Cæsars. At the head of that gallant nation is the great—the greatest—man of the present age. It becomes us well to consider his situation. The things he has achieved, compel him to the achievement of things more great. In his vast career, we must soon become objects to command attention. We too, in our turn, must contend or submit. By submission we may indeed have peace, alike precarious and ignominious. But is this the peace which we ought to seek? Will this satisfy the just expectation of our country? No. Let us have peace permanent, secure, and, if I may use the term, independent. Peace which depends, not on the pity of others, but on our own force. Let us have the only peace worth having, a peace consistent with honor.

A gentleman near me (Mr. JACKSON) has told us the anecdote of an old courtier, who said, that the interest of his nation was the honor of his nation. I was surprised to hear that idea from that gentleman. But it was not his own. Such is that gentleman's high sense of his personal honor, that no interest would induce him to sacrifice it. He would not permit the proudest prince on earth to blot or soil it. Millions would not purchase his honor, and will he feel less for the honor of his country? No; he will defend it with his best blood. He will feel with me, that our national honor is the best security for our peace and our prosperity. That it involves at once our wealth and our power. And in this view of the subject I must contradict a sentiment which fell from my honorable colleague, (Mr. CLINTON.) He tells us that the principle of this country is peace and commerce. Sir, the avowal of such principle will leave us neither commerce nor peace. It invites others to prey on that commerce which we will not protect, and share the wealth we dare not defend. But let it be known that you stand ready to sacrifice the last man, and the last shilling in defence of your national honor, and those who would have assailed will beware of you.

Before I go into a minute consideration of this subject, I will notice what the gentlemen opposed to me have said on the law of nations. But I must observe that, in a conjuncture like the present, there is more sound sense, and more sound policy in the firm and manly sentiments which warm the hearts of my friends from Delaware, than in all the volumes upon all the shelves of the civilians. Let us, however, attend to the results of those logical deductions which have been made by writers on the law of nations. The honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) has told us that Sovereigns ought to show a sincere desire of peace, and should not hastily take offence, because it may be that the offensive act was the result of mistake. My honorable colleague has told us, that among the justifiable causes of war, are the deliberate invasions of right, and the necessity of maintaining the balance of power. He has told us further, that attempts should always be made to obtain redress by treaty, unless it be evident that redress cannot be so obtained. The honorable member from Georgia near me, informs us, that the thing we would obtain by war should be important, and the success probable, and that war should be avoided until it be inevitable. The honorable member from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) has explained to us the case cited by the gentleman from Kentucky, as being that of a wrong done by a private citizen. Under the weight of all this authority, and concurring with gentlemen in these their positions, I shall take leave to examine the great question we are called on to decide. I shall moreover fully and entirely agree with the honorable member near me in another point. He has, with the usual rapidity of his mind, seized the whole object. He tells us, and he tells us truly, that the island of New Orleans and the two Floridas, are essential to this country. They are joined, says he, by God, and sooner or later we must and will have them. In this clear and energetic statement I fully agree; and the greater part of what I have to say will be but a commentary on the doctrines they have advanced, an elucidation of their positions, and the confirmation of that strong conclusion.

In order to bring this extensive subject within such bounds as may enable us to take a distinct view of its several parts, I shall consider first, the existing state of things; secondly, the consequence to the United States of the possession of that country by France; thirdly, the consequence to other nations; fourthly, the importance of it to France herself; fifthly, its importance to the United States if possessed by them: and having thus examined the thing itself in its various relations, the way will be open to consider, sixthly, the effect of negotiation; and then, seventhly, the consequences to be expected from taking immediate possession.

Before I consider the existing state of things, let me notice what gentlemen have said in relation to it. The honorable member from Kentucky has told us, that indeed there is a right arrested, but whether by authority or not is equivocal. He says the representative of Spain verily believes it to be an unauthorized act. My honorable colleague informs us there has been a clashing between the Governor and Intendant. He says we are told by the Spanish Minister it was unauthorized. Notwithstanding these assurances, however, my honorable colleague has, it seems, some doubts; but nevertheless he presumes innocence, for my colleague is charitable. The honorable member from Maryland goes further. He tells us the Minister of Spain says, the Intendant had no such authority, and the Minister of France, too, says there is no such authority. Sir, I have all possible respect for those gentlemen, and every proper confidence in what they may think proper to communicate. I believe the Spanish Minister has the best imaginable disposition to preserve peace; being indeed the express purpose for which he was sent among us. I believe it to be an object near to his heart, and which has a strong hold upon his affections. I respect the warmth and benevolence of his feelings, but he must pardon me that I am deficient in courtly compliments; I am a republican, and cannot commit the interests of my country to the goodness of his heart.

What is the state of things? There has been a cession of the island of New Orleans and of Louisiana to France. Whether the Floridas have also been ceded is not yet certain. It has been said, as from authority, and I think it probable. Now, sir, let us note the time and the manner of this cession. It was at or immediately after the treaty of Lunenville, at the first moment when France could take up a distant object of attention. But had Spain a right to make this cession without our consent? Gentlemen have taken it for granted that she had. But I deny the position. No nation has a right to give to another a dangerous neighbor without her consent. This is not like the case of private citizens, for there, when a man is injured, he can resort to the tribunals for redress; and yet, even there, to dispose of property to one who is a bad neighbor is always considered as an act of unkindness. But as between nations, who can redress themselves only by war, such transfer is in itself an aggression. He who renders me insecure; he who hazards my peace, and exposes me to imminent danger, commits an act of hostility against me, and gives me the rights consequent on that act. Suppose Great Britain should give to Algiers one of the Bahamas, and contribute thereby to establish a nest of pirates near your coasts, would you not consider it as an aggression? Suppose, during the late war, you had conveyed to France a tract of land along Hudson's river, and the northern route by the Lakes into Canada, would not Britain have considered and treated it as an act of direct hostility? It is among the first limitations to the exercise of the rights of property, that we must so use our own as not to injure another; and it is under the immediate sense of this restriction that nations are bound to act toward each other.

But it is not this transfer alone. There are circumstances both in the time and in the manner of it which deserve attention. A gentleman from Maryland (Mr. WRIGHT) has told you, that all treaties ought to be published and proclaimed for the information of other nations. I ask, was this a public treaty? No. Was official notice of it given to the Government of this country? Was it announced to the President of the United States, in the usual forms of civility between nations who duly respect each other? It was not. Let gentlemen contradict me if they can. They will say perhaps that it was the omission only of a vain and idle ceremony. Ignorance may indeed pretend that such communication is an empty compliment, which, established without use, may be omitted without offence. But this is not so. If these be ceremonies they are not vain, but of serious import, and are founded on strong reason. He who means me well, acts without disguise. Had this transaction been intended fairly, it would have been told frankly. But it was secret because it was hostile. The First Consul, in the moment of terminating his differences with you, sought the means of future influence and control. He found and secured a pivot for that immense lever, by which, with potent arm, he means to subvert your civil and political institutions. Thus, the beginning was made in deep hostility. Conceived in such principles, it presaged no good. Its bodings were evil, and evil have been its fruits. We heard of it during the last session of Congress, but to this hour we have not heard of any formal and regular communication from those by whom it was made. Has the King of Spain, has the First Consul of France, no means of making such communication to the President of the United States? Yes, sir, we have a Minister in Spain; we have a Minister in France. Nothing was easier, and yet nothing has been done. Our First Magistrate has been treated with contempt; and through him our country has been insulted.

With that meek and peaceful spirit now so strongly recommended, we submitted to this insult, and what followed? That which might have been expected; a violation of our treaty. An open and direct violation by a public officer of the Spanish Government. This is not the case cited from one of the books. It is not a wrong done by a private citizen, which might, for that reason, be of doubtful nature. No; it is by a public officer,—that officer, in whose particular department it was to cause the faithful observance of the treaty which he has violated. We are told indeed that there was a clashing of opinion between the Governor and the Intendant. But what have we to do with their domestic broils? The injury is done, we feel it. Let the fault be whose it may, the suffering is ours. But, say gentlemen, the Spanish Minister has interfered to correct this irregular procedure. Sir, if the Intendant was amenable to the Minister, why did he not inform him of the step he was about to take, that the President of the United States might seasonably have been apprized of his intention, and given the proper notice to our fellow-citizens? Why has he first learnt this offensive act from those who suffer by it? Why is he thus held up to contempt and derision? If the Intendant is to be controlled by the Minister, would he have taken a step so important without his advice? Common sense will say no. But, the bitter cup of humiliation was not yet full. Smarting under the lash of the Intendant, the Minister soothes you with assurances, and sends advice-boats to announce your forbearance. But while they are on their way, new injury and new insult are added. The Intendant, as if determined to try the extent of your meekness, forbids to your citizens all communication with those who inhabit the shores of the Mississippi. Though they should be starving, the Spaniard is made criminal who should give them food. Fortunately, the waters of the river are potable, or else we should be precluded from the common benefits of nature, the common bounty of heaven. What then, I ask, is the amount of this savage conduct? Sir, it is war. Open and direct war. And yet gentlemen recommend peace, and forbid us to take up the gauntlet of defiance. Will gentlemen sit here and shut their eyes to the state and condition of their country? I shall not reply to what has been said respecting depredations on commerce, but confine myself to objects of which there can be no shadow of doubt. Here is a vast country given away, and not without danger to us.

Has a nation a right to put these States in a dangerous situation? No, sir. And yet it has been done, not only without our consent previous to the grant, but without observing the common forms of civility after it was made. Is that wonderful man who presides over the destinies of France, ignorant or unmindful of these forms? See what was done the other day. He directed his Minister to communicate to the Elector of Bavaria, his intended movements in Switzerland, and their object. He knew the Elector had a right to expect that information, although the greater part of Swabia lies between his dominions and Switzerland. And this right is founded on the broad principles already mentioned.

As to the depredations on our commerce, they are numerous, and of great importance; but my honorable colleague has told us, our merchants are in a fair way of getting redress. I own, sir, I am surprised at this information, which is, I presume, a State secret, communicated from the Executive department. My honorable colleague, who is the pattern of discretion, who was the monitor, and threatened to be the castigatorem of those who, from treachery or weakness, might betray or divulge the secrets of the Senate, cannot possibly allude to anything on our files. He has, therefore, received this information from some other quarter; and I feel myself much obliged by his kind communication. But he must pardon me, sir, that until it comes forward in some body, shape, or condition, which I can grasp, I am compelled to withhold my faith.

Having thus examined the existing state of things, I proceed to consider the consequence to the United States, resulting from the possession of that country by France. To this effect I shall suppose the Floridas to be included in her newly acquired dominion, and shall state what I conceive to be the conduct which she will pursue. She will, I presume, consider herself as not bound by our treaty with Spain. Declaring this to the inhabitants of the western country, and repelling the claim of right, she will (as matter of favor) give them unlimited freedom of trade to and from New Orleans. At that place, she will eventually raise a considerable duty on exports, to pay the expense of her garrisons, and of the civil administration. But to compensate this, she will probably give an exclusive privilege of commerce to her colonies, and obtain from Spain and Holland similar privileges. Under these circumstances, let us examine the general and particular consequences to this our country.

The general consequences are those which affect our commerce, our revenue, our defence, and what is of more importance even than these, our Union. Your commerce will suffer, because you will no longer hold the means of supplying the West India islands subject to our single control, and because all the export from New Orleans being, of course, in French bottoms, your navigation will be proportionably diminished. Your revenue will suffer as much as your commerce. The extensive boundary, of more than two thousand miles, will be stocked with goods for the purpose of contraband trade. The inhabitants will naturally take their supplies in that way. You must therefore multiply your revenue officers and their assistants, and while your receipt diminishes, the expense of collection will be increased. As to what regards your defence, it is evident that the decrease of your navigation and revenue must narrow your means of defence; you cannot provide the same force either by land or by sea. But the evil does not stop there. With this country in your possession, you have means of defence more ample, more important, more easy, than any nation on earth. In a short time all the West India islands, fed from your granaries, must depend on your will; and, in consequence, all the Powers of Europe who have colonies there, must court your friendship. Those rich sources of commercial importance will be as it were in your hands. They will be pledges for the amity of others in seas and dominions far remote. It is a defence which, though it costs you nothing, is superior to fleets and armies. But let the resources of America be divided, (which must happen when the French are masters of New Orleans,) and all this power and influence are gone. One half your resources will be in their hands, and they will laugh at your feeble attempts with the other half. It is the interest of this country that the possessions of European Powers in the West Indies should be secured to them. And in this view of the subject it is important that the island of St. Domingo should be subjected by France; it would therefore have been wise to have aided in that subjugation. There is indeed a special reason for it beyond the considerations of external policy. That event will give to your slaves the conviction that it is impossible for them to become free. Men in their unhappy condition must be impelled by fear, and discouraged by despair. Yes—the impulsion of fear must be strengthened by the hand of despair! Consider, moreover, your condition in the wars which are most likely to happen. These must be either with France or England. If with France, your interior is ruined; if with England, the commerce of the Atlantic States will be distressed, and that of the western country too, though not perhaps in so great a degree. Thus, let the war be with whichever of those nations it may, one half of the United States must be peculiarly injured; and in all cases it will be difficult for them to assist each other. The interior has no seamen for naval defence, the seaboard can send few if any troops beyond the mountains. This powerful influence of one nation on one great division of our country, and of another nation on the remainder, will tend to disunite us. The ridge of mountains will mark the line of distinct interests. The effect of those differing interests will be felt in your councils. It will find its way to this floor. This must be the case so long as man is man. Look, I pray, at those nations. The enmity of France and England can terminate only by the subjection of one to the dominion of the other. It must be by the complete exertion of force, and the utter impossibility of resistance. They are the Rome and Carthage of modern times. Their implacable spirit will stimulate them to attempt a division of this country by sentiments of hatred, deadly as their own. These efforts will, I hope, be vain: but with such powerful engines to operate on the interest and the will, is there not danger to that union so essential to our prosperity? There will be a constant struggle in Congress as to the kind of public force which ought to be maintained. The one part will desire an army, the other a navy. The unyielding spirit of party will, perhaps, prevent the support of either; leaving the nation completely defenceless, and thereby increasing the power of those who may influence or command our destinies. For, let it be remembered, that a nation without public force, is not an independent nation. In a greater or smaller degree, she will receive the law from others.

Having thus considered the effect of this session upon the United States, in a general point of view, let us now examine it more particularly, as it regards the greater divisions of our country, the Western, the Southern, the Middle, and the Eastern States. I fear, sir, I shall detain you longer than I intended, certainly longer than the light of day will last; notwithstanding my effort to comprise what I have to say in the smallest compass. As to the Western States, the effects will be remote and immediate. Those more remote may be examined under the twofold aspect of peace and war. In peace they will suffer the diminution of price for their produce. The advantage of supplying the French, Dutch, and Spanish colonies, may at first sight lead to a different opinion; but when the port of New Orleans is shut to all but French ships, there will no longer be that competition which now exists, and which always results in the highest price that commodities can bear. The French merchants have neither the large capital, nor have they the steady temper and persevering industry which foster commerce. Their invariable object in trade, is to acquire sudden wealth by large profit; and if that cannot be done, they abandon the pursuit for some new project. Certain of the market, and certain of the increasing supply, they will prescribe the price, both to those who cultivate, and to those who consume. Such will be the effect in peace.

In a war with Great Britain, the attention of her fleets to cut off supplies from her enemies, must necessarily affect the price of produce in a still greater degree; and in a war with France it will bear no price at all, until New Orleans shall be wrested from their grasp. Add to this the danger and the devastation from the troops of that country, aided by innumerable hosts of savages from the western wilds. Such being the evident effects to be produced in times not far remote, the present evil follows from the anticipation of them. The price of land must be reduced, from the certainty that its produce will become less valuable. The flood of emigration to those fertile regions must cease to flow. The debts incurred in the hope of advantageous sales, must remain unpaid. The distress of the debtor must then recoil on his creditor, and, from the common relations of society, become general.

What will be the effect on the Southern States? Georgia, Carolina, and the Mississippi Territory are exposed to invasion from the Floridas and New Orleans. There are circumstances in that portion of America which render the invasion easy, and the defence difficult. Pensacola, though the climate be warm, is among the healthiest spots on earth. Not only a large garrison, but an army may remain there without hazard. At Pensacola and St. Augustine, forces may be assembled to operate in that season of the year, when the morasses which separate them from our southern frontier no longer breathe pestilence. By what are those armies to be opposed? Will you call the militia from the North to assist their Southern brethren? They are too remote. Will you secure their seasonable aid, bring them early to the fields they are ordered to defend? They must perish. The climate, more fatal than the sword, will destroy them before they see their foe. The country adjoining to our Southern frontier is now in possession of the most numerous tribes of savages we are acquainted with. The access to it from New Orleans and the Floridas is easy and immediate. The toys and gewgaws manufactured in France, will be scattered in abundance, to win their affections, and seduce them from their present connexion. The talents of the French to gain the good will of the savages is well known, and the disposition of those uncultured men for war, is equally notorious. Here then is a powerful instrument of destruction, which may be used against you with ruinous effect. Besides, what is the population of the Southern States? Do you not tremble when you look at it? Have we not within these few days passed a law to prevent the importation of certain dangerous characters? What will hinder them from arriving in the Floridas, and what can guard the approach from thence to our Southern frontier? These pernicious emissaries may stimulate with a prospect of freedom the miserable men who now toil without hope. They may excite them to imitate a fatal example, and to act over those scenes which fill our minds with horror. When the train shall be laid; when the conspiracy shall be ripe; when the armies of France shall reach your frontier, the firing of the first musket will be a signal for general carnage and conflagration. If you will not see your danger now, the time must soon arrive when you shall feel it. The Southern States being exposed to such imminent danger, their Representatives may be made to know, that a vote given in Congress shall realize the worst apprehensions. You will then feel their danger even on this floor.

Such being the probable result as to the Southern, what will it be to the Middle States? Their trade to the West India islands is gone the moment that country is in possession of the French. England, to whose dominion alone they can have recourse for the vent of their produce and the purchase of their supplies, will confine that commerce to her own ships. I say the moment the French are in possession of New Orleans your West India trade is gone. I do not mean that this effect will be as sudden as a flash of lightning, but it will be gone in a few years, which may be considered as a moment when compared with national existence. You will then be dependant for that trade on the good will of England, and as your navigation decreases, your dependence will be still greater, because you will rely on her navy for your protection. I again repeat, that when it shall be a question in your councils whether you will have a navy, the increasing weight of the western country will be thrown into the scale of opposition. They will insist on an army for their protection. My honorable colleague has expressed his fears from a standing army. Sir, your present negligence will put you under the necessity of having such an army, and expose you to all the consequences to be apprehended from it. You may indeed remain united in a body as one nation, but with such contrariant interests and opinions, with sentiments and views so different, it will be a large and languishing body without a soul.

To the Eastern States, when separately considered, this may appear a matter of less moment than to the other great divisions of our country. But they will perceive in it the loss of their navigation; they will see the theatre of their industrious exertions contracted; they will feel the loss of the productions of that western world in the mass of their commercial operations; and above all, they will feel the loss of an ample resource for their children. These western regions are peculiarly their heritage. It is the property of the fathers of America, which they hold in trust for their children. The exuberant population of the Eastern States flows in a steady stream to the western world, and if that be rendered useless, or pass under the dominion of a foreign Power, the fairest hope of posterity is destroyed. The time may come, and I fear it will come, when those who cross the mountains will cross the line of jurisdiction. Whether we consider, therefore, this object in its relations to our general policy, or examine its bearings on the greater divisions of our country, we find ample reason to agree with the gentleman near me, that New Orleans and the Floridas must not be separated from the United States.

Let us now consider the consequence of the cession we complain of, to other nations, and this we may do generally, and then more especially as to those who have a direct and immediate interest in the transaction. In a general view, the first prominent feature is the colossal power of France. Dangerous to Europe and to the world, what will be the effect of a great increase of that power? Look at Europe! One half of it is blotted from the list of empire. Austria, Russia, Prussia, and Britain, are the only Powers remaining, except Sweden and Denmark, and they are paralyzed. Where is Italy, Switzerland, Flanders, and all Germany west of the Rhine? Gone; swallowed up in the empire of the Gauls. Holland, Spain, Portugal, reduced to a state of submission and dependence. What is the situation of the Powers that remain? Austria is cut off from Italy, the great object of her ambition for more than three centuries; long the rival of France, long balancing with the Bourbons the fate of Europe, she must now submit, and tacitly acknowledge to the world the superiority of her foe, and her own humiliation. Prussia, under the auspices of the Great Frederick, was at the head of a Germanic league to balance the imperial power. Though united with Austria for a moment in the hollow league of the coalition, she has, like Austria, been actuated by a blind jealousy, and favoring the operations of France for the ruin of her rival, expected to share largely in the general spoil. In this fond hope she is disappointed; she now sees the power of France at her door. There is not a fortress from the Rhine to the Baltic, except Magdeburgh, which the First Consul may leave on his left. The fertile plains near Leipsic contain the magazines for his armies when he shall think proper to march to Berlin. Westphalia and Lower Saxony are open on the side of Flanders and Holland. The Maine presents him a military road to the borders of Bohemia. By the Necker he approaches Ulm, and establishes himself on the Danube. These rivers enable him to take the vast resources of his wide domain to the point where he may wish to employ them. Menacing at pleasure his neighbors, he is himself secured by a line of fortresses along his whole frontier. Switzerland, which was the only feeble point of his defence, and which separated his Gallic and Italian dominions, has lately been subjected. The voice you now hear, warned the Swiss of their fate more than eight years ago. The idea seemed then extravagant; but realized, it appears but as a necessary incident. Russia is deprived of her influence in Germany, and thereby of a principal instrument by which her policy might operate on the great Powers of the south. The Germanic body is indeed in the hand of the First Consul. Three new Electors along the Rhine are under the mouths of his cannon. They dare not speak. Speak! None dare speak. They dare not think anything inconsistent with his wishes. Even at their courtly feasts they sit like Damocles, destruction suspended over their heads by a single hair. Would you know the sentiment of England? Look at the debates. In the two Houses of Parliament they speak their fears. Such being the general sentiment of Europe, can it be supposed that they will view without anxiety a new extension of that power and dominion, the object of their hatred and apprehension?

Will it be said that there is a security to the freedom of mankind from the moderation with which this enormous power is to be exercised? Vain delusion! This power is not the result of accident. At the moment when France dethroned her Sovereign, it was easy to foresee that a contest must ensue in which her existence would be staked against the empire of the world. If not conquered by surrounding princes, (and the hope of such conquest, unless by the aid of her own citizens, was idle,) her numerous armies acquiring discipline must eventually conquer. She had the advantages of situation, and those which result from union, opposed to councils uncertain and selfish. It was easy also to foresee that, in the same progress of events, some fortunate soldier would seat himself on the vacant throne; for the idea of a French Republic was always a ridiculous chimera. Bonaparte has placed himself at the head of that nation by deeds which cast a lustre on his name. In his splendid career he must proceed. When he ceases to act he will cease to reign. Whenever in any plan he fails, that moment he falls. He is condemned to magnificence. To him are forbidden the harmonies and the charities of social life. He commands a noble and gallant nation, passionately fond of glory. That nation stimulates him to glorious enterprise, and, because they are generous and brave, they insure his success. Thus the same principle presents at once the object and the means. Impelled by imperious circumstances, he rules in Europe, and he will rule here also, unless by vigorous exertion you set a bound to his power.

Having cast thus a rapid glance at the general state of Europe, it remains to look particularly at the condition of England and Spain, so far as they may be affected by the cession of those provinces to France. England will see in it an increase of commerce and naval force for her rival. She will see imminent danger to her islands, and particularly to Jamaica. The climate of Pensacola has already been noticed. The position is of incalculable moment. During the sickly and hurricane season, fleets and armies may wait there in safety till their enemy shall be enfeebled and unprotected. Where will the British fleets and armies be stationed with equal advantage? If they ask an asylum in your ports, you must refuse; for, should you listen to any such proposition, your kindness would be considered as a hostile aggression. The influence of France on the United States (which has already been noticed) will give double weight to her representations. And this very influence is among the effects which Britain must deprecate. I have not time to dwell on this subject, nor many others, as fully as I ought. The condition of Spain is not less worthy of notice. No two nations on earth have more deep-rooted hatred for each other than France and Spain: there are none more different in essential points of character. United, however, under Sovereigns of the same family, these antipathies were wearing away. But the fatal stroke which destroyed the French monarch has severed that band. Force has since produced submission, but not union. It is not natural that the Spanish King should foster kindly sentiments for him who has decked himself in the spoil of his house. The proud, the brave, and the loyal Castilian groans under the yoke which galls him, but which he cannot break, and sickens at the recollection of his ancient glory. His deep resentments are known, and it is to prevent their effects that he has been compelled to make the cession of those provinces. France will then hold, at her discretion, the Spanish treasures and the rich provinces of the New World. At the first symptom of hostile sentiment she arrests the means of aggression. Thus the dependence of Spain is rendered absolute, and her chains are riveted forever. Does Spain behold this state of things with calm indifference? No; she feels all the pangs of wounded pride, driven to the necessity of perpetuating its own humiliation.

A few words, after what has already been said, will suffice to show the importance of those provinces to France. This results from the influence on her rival, on Spain, and on the United States; by means of the position, the resources, and the means of aggression which those provinces afford. Enough has been said of the position. The resources are great and increasing. Not only cotton and indigo will be furnished for her manufactures, but supplies and subsistence for her colonies and her troops. These resources, too, will be at the very point most important both for defence and aggressions. The same force will be ready to operate either against England, Spain, or America. Thus that force will be tripled in its moral effect, and influence alike the conduct of all against whom it may be directed. To what has been said on the facility with which we may be assailed, I might add much, but it is unnecessary. It behooves us, however, to consider well the spirit of the French Government, which, in all its changes, has never lost sight of this object. The French Minister, M. De la Luzerne, when Congress were deliberating on the ultimata for peace, obtained a resolution that our Ministers should, as to our western boundary, treat under the dictation of France. Our Ministers disdained the condition, and refused to obey. Their manly conduct obtained for you the countries whose fate is now suspended on your deliberations. Never, no never, has France lost sight of Louisiana. Never for a moment has she been blind to its importance. Those who, driven from her bosom into exile, wandered about among us, have gathered and communicated the fullest information. While they enjoyed your hospitality, they probed your weakness, and meditated the means of controlling your conduct. Whatever may be the fair appearances, rely on it that every Frenchman bears with him everywhere a French heart, and so he ought. I honor him for it. Oh, that Americans had always an American heart!

It remains to notice the advantage of this country to the United States, as it may relate to our power, our peace, our commerce, and above all, our freedom. As to our power something has already been said on the peaceful influence which results from the dependence of colonies belonging to the great nations of Europe; add to this, that the product of those colonies must pass by our doors and be exposed to our cruisers. A further advantage is to be found in the ready means of invasion (in concert with the troops of others) if driven to the necessity of war. The possession of power will give us not only security, but peace. Peace indeed can never be safe but by the aid of power. Our disposition is pacific. It is our interest to be at peace, and the form of our Government, while it secures us the enjoyment of as much liberty as is possible, renders it particularly imprudent to risk in war, any change of the Constitution. Grant us these provinces, and we can dictate the conditions of our commerce with the island. Possessed of them, it will be doubly lucrative, and without them, wholly uncertain. There is another stream of profitable trade which will then flow in our channels. The risk and difficulty which Spain experiences in bringing home her treasures when she is at war, will naturally suggest the advantage of remitting them through this country. The produce of the Mexican mines may then be shipped directly to Asia. It will be paid for to Spain by the bills on the commercial nations, and thus furnish to her the easy means of obtaining the supplies she may stand in need of. The bullion will be so much the more valuable, as the danger and expense of transportation are diminished. This, therefore, would have a beneficial result upon the whole commercial world. It would more especially emancipate Spain from her present thralldom. It would give a happy change to all her interior administration, and increase both her absolute and relative force. Let me say here, that it is our interest to preserve the authority of Spain over her American territory. We have enough of our own. We can have no wish to extend our dominion. We want men, not land. We are therefore the natural, and the safe guardians of Spain. On us she may rely with perfect confidence. We can derive from that commerce, which it is her interest to permit, all the advantage we ought to ask for.

But great as are the benefits which will result from the possession of the Floridas and New Orleans, great as is their tendency to advance our power, secure our peace, and extend our commerce, there is a consideration, in comparison with which, commerce, peace, and power, are of but slight avail. These provinces will fortify the defences of our freedom. My honorable colleague has stated to you his apprehensions of standing armies; and yet, sir, if we be not possessed of this territory, standing armies become necessary. Without an imposing military force, the inhabitants of the Western country will be in such immediate danger, that they must league with a neighbor who will have everything to offer, and from whom they will have everything to fear. This will lead to the worst of all wars—to civil war; and when that shall happen, liberty will soon be lost. The army which has defeated one-half the nation, will easily lend itself to enslave the other. Such is the history, and such will ever be the fate of man. In this view, then, above all others, is that possession most precious. When it is in our hands, we need no standing army. We can turn our whole attention to naval defence, which gives complete security both at home and abroad. When we have twenty ships-of-the-line at sea, and there is no good reason why we should not have them, we shall be respected by all Europe. The sense of security resulting from such force, must give a new spring to industry and increase the stock of national wealth. The expense, compared with the benefit, is moderate, nay, trifling. And let me here say one word as to national expense. Sir, whatever sums are necessary to secure the national independence must be paid. They will not amount to one-half of what it must cost us to be subdued. If we will not pay to be defended, we must pay for being conquered. There is no medium, and but the single alternative. In the proper expenditure for defence, therefore, is true economy, and every pitiful saving, inconsistent with that object, is the worst, the most profligate profusion.

Having now considered, in its various relations, the importance of these provinces, the way is open to estimate our chance of obtaining them by negotiation. Let me ask on what ground you mean to treat? Do you expect to persuade? Do you hope to intimidate? If to persuade, what are your means of persuasion? Every gentleman admits the importance of this country. Think you the First Consul, whose capacious mind embraces the globe, is alone ignorant of its value? Is he a child whom you may win by a rattle to comply with your wishes? Will you, like a nurse, sing to him a lullaby? If you have no hope from fondling attentions and soothing sounds, what have you to offer in exchange? Have you anything to give which he will take? He wants power. You have no power. He wants dominion. You have no dominion. At least none that you can grant. He wants influence in Europe. And have you any influence in Europe? What, in the name of Heaven, are the means by which you would render this negotiation successful? Is it by some secret spell? Have you any magic power? Will you draw a circle, and conjure up devils to assist you? Or do you rely on the charms of those beautiful girls with whom the gentleman near me says, the French grenadiers are to incorporate? If so, why do you not send an embassy of women? Gentlemen talk of the principles of our Government, as if they could obtain for us the desired boon. But what will these principles avail? When you inquire as to the force of France, Austria, or Russia, do you ask whether they have a habeas corpus act, or a trial by jury? Do you estimate their power, discuss their interior police? No. The question is, how many battalions have they? What train of artillery can they bring into the field? How many ships can they send to sea? These are the important circumstances which command respect and facilitate negotiation: Can you display these powerful motives? Alas! alas! To all these questions you answer by one poor word—confidence—confidence—confidence. Yea, verily, we have confidence. We have faith and hope; ay, and we have charity too. Well, go to market with these Christian virtues, and what will you get for them? Just nothing. Yet in the face of reason and experience, you have confidence; but in whom? Why, in our worthy President. But he cannot make the treaty alone. There must be two parties to a bargain. I ask if you have confidence also in the First Consul? But whither, in the name of Heaven, does this confidence lead and to what does it tend? The time is precious. We waste, and we have already wasted moments which will never return. You have already tried negotiation. I say you have tried it, because I know you have a Minister in France, and I am sure the First Magistrate of our country cannot have been so negligent as not to pay attention to a subject which is confessedly of such magnitude. You have then negotiated. And with what success? Why, instead of defeating the cession, you, have closed the river; instead of obtaining any advantage by a new treaty, you have the lost the benefit of an old one. Such are the results of your negotiation in Europe. In this country you have negotiated to get back the privilege you are robbed of; and what follows? A prohibition to touch their shores. Instead of restoring the rights of treaty, they cut you off from the rights of humanity. Such is your splendid success from negotiation; and yet gentlemen tell us we must continue to negotiate. The honorable member from Kentucky says, that great lengths are gone in inquiring into, and rectifying the irregular procedure. He tells us a Minister is just appointed, and it would, therefore, be inconsistent to fight just now; that moreover it would degrade the President's authority, and defeat his measures. The gentleman from Georgia says we have no right to go to war till there shall be a refusal on the part of Spain; and my honorable colleague assures us, that if our wrongs are redressed by negotiation, we can have no complaint. As to the lengths which are gone, it is for those gentlemen to appreciate their value, who know what they are. I profess my ignorance, and judging by effects, must withhold my confidence. If we must wait for a pointed refusal before we do ourselves right, I venture to predict a delay fatal to the peace of this country. But, sir, what is it we are to ask, the refusal of which will justify war? Is it (as my honorable colleague supposes) a mere restitution of a privilege wrongfully taken away? Sir, I answer in the words of the resolutions moved by my friend. "It does not consist with the dignity of this country to hold a right so important by a tenure so uncertain." But the honorable member from Maryland has told us that we need not cross the Atlantic to seek for precedents, that we have enough on our own archives, and he has had the goodness to mention our humble petitions presented to the King of Great Britain in 1775. We sent, says he, petition after petition. I am sure that honorable member has no wish that a Minister should be sent to bear our humble petitions to the footstool of the First Consul's throne. But, sir, whether we treat or pray, it will end as it did in 1775, by war, unless we are determined to give up that independence which we then fought to establish. Let us consider a moment the natural course of this negotiation. It is the interest of France to foster in us a hope from treaty, until she has put herself in a condition to frustrate all other hope. There can be no question, therefore, that she has avoided, and will avoid a direct refusal. And as long as we are content to accept of smooth speeches, general assurances, vague assertions, and loose evasions, we shall have no want of that court currency. But why (it may be said) has she not already taken possession? Because her original plans have been greatly deranged. St. Domingo presented obstacles unexpected, and that enterprise must not be abandoned, for though the island may not in itself be of much consequence; though it must be ruined before it can be conquered, yet conquered it must be, for the world must continue to believe that the First Consul cannot fail in what he has undertaken. Much of his power rests on that opinion, and it must, therefore, be maintained. But there are other incidents besides those of St. Domingo which have had the same tendency. There followed on the general peace a serious discussion of the German indemnities; then the affairs of Italy; lately of Switzerland; and during the whole momentous period it was doubtful how far England would bear a continued invasion of the liberties of Europe. And it was evident that, should the war recommence with England, the force sent to this country would be totally lost. It was important, therefore, to gain time; and for that very reason we should have insisted on an immediate decision. Such, then, is the state of this treaty so fondly desired. A treaty by which we are to ask much and offer nothing. A negotiation in which we have no means to persuade. Have we any to intimidate? Where is your public force? You have none; and seem resolved not to have or use any. My honorable colleague tells us that war will increase our debt one hundred millions, and that our people are not fond of taxes. He says we are trying a new experiment to pay our debts in a given period, which war would derange. It would injure, moreover, our pacific character, and might draw down the jealousy of all nations who have colonies. He believes that three-fourths of our people are opposed to war; but yet he thinks that nine months hence we shall be in a better condition. What is the effect of this language? Is it not to convince the adverse party that he has nothing to fear from a refusal? As to this experiment for the payment of our debts, whether it has the merit of novelty I shall not inquire; but I am bold to assert that the merit, be it what it may, is due to one of my worthy friends who formerly administered our finances. The same plan also has been adopted by another great statesman, (Mr. Pitt,) who has for many years past provided regularly a fund to liquidate in a given period each debt which his nation has incurred. But does England trust her safety to the protection of her sinking fund? No. She has fifty thousand seamen employed, and a hundred thousand soldiers; these form the shield of her defence. A gentleman near me has told us, that in case of war our mercantile capital is exposed in every part of the world. To this I answer, first, that the same objection will apply with equal weight upon any and every occasion. But further, I say, the argument is directly and completely against him. How does it stand? He admits that if negotiation fails he will draw the sword

He goes further, and says he will throw away the scabbard. Now, sir, it is clear that if we operate at once, notice may be given to our merchants. Advices may be sent in season to every sea; and here let me say, that it is a duty of the Government to apprise both our insurers and shippers of their dangerous situation. It is unwise as well as unjust to lull them into a fatal security. But suppose the treaty shall fail, and remember that the success or failure depends on Bonaparte: he will weigh the present declarations and act accordingly. He will commence a war on your commerce long before you know that war exists. I say, therefore, the argument is directly against the gentleman who used it. And here let me say one word on the comparative merits of the resolutions on your table. Those moved by my honorable friend give the President command not only of the militia, but of the naval and military force. They place money at his disposal, and what is more important, they put it in his power to use these efficient means. The resolutions moved as an amendment, authorize indeed a call for a greater number of militia, but when called they can do nothing but consume their rations. There is no power to bring them into action, and of course the expense is useless, even for the purpose of influence.

Having endeavored to show that we have no hope from treaty, it only remains to consider the natural effect of taking an immediate possession. Against this measure, it has been said, that war, instead of giving relief, will absolutely shut up the Mississippi. That a single seventy-four in the mouth of that river would stop it effectually. I believe, sir, it would not only stop but turn it; for a seventy-four would run aground and obstruct the channel. But what is the amount of these observations? The gentlemen all agree that if they cannot obtain their object without war, they will fight for it. The mischief they deprecate must, therefore, arrive, unless there be a well-grounded hope from treaty; and the only difference is, that they are willing to take a longer term of sufferance, because they have a stronger expectation of relief without the exertion of force. I have no such expectation. I shall, therefore, proceed to consider what will follow if we take possession without a previous alliance with Britain, or with such an alliance. I have heard it urged in conversation, that such alliance should first be made, and, therefore, I think it proper to take up the subject in debate. I cannot, however, but remark on the different language now held from that which we heard a year ago. Then, it was the fashion to say we had nothing to do with other nations. And when a man of plain sense observed that this disposition was of little avail, because other nations would have something to do with us; and when the danger we now see was pointed out, oh! then, to be sure, there was nothing to apprehend from our dear sister Republic! I censure no man for adopting other and wiser principles. I have no question but that, as gentlemen proceed in the business of government, they will see the folly of many other fanciful notions, but I must entreat them not to fly from one extreme to the other. I hesitate not to give my opinion, that we ought to take possession without consulting Great Britain. And having done so, let us declare to France that we mean to live with her in perfect amity. Let us offer every assistance in our power to conquer and preserve St. Domingo. Let us show her that we have done an act of mere defence. Let us prove our pacific disposition, by declaring that we are under the tie of no obligation to her rival. To Spain, let us hold a similar language. Let us point out her present danger, and demonstrate the utility of our possession. To both, let us offer to relinquish our claims for spoliation on our commerce, and pay our own merchants. We can well afford to purchase with that price—a price paid to ourselves. Finally, if our representations do not produce the desired effect, let us tell them that we will ally ourselves to England, and aid in the conquest of all their American dominions. Sir, this language will be listened to. Rely on it that, under such circumstances, neither France nor Spain dare send hither a single regiment or a single ship. The existence of the British naval force will alone produce all the effect you could ask from its operation. But what are we to hope from a delay until an alliance shall be made? What will be the stipulations of the treaty of alliance? These may be more or less onerous or pernicious. Certainly the British Minister will not hazard the fate of his nation without the hope of some correspondent advantage. One stipulation is certain—we must agree to continue the war until a peace can be obtained by common consent—and this is precisely the stipulation which we ought not to make, if it can be avoided, because we shall then be no longer masters of our exterior relations. To this it may be objected, that we cannot expect aid from Britain without a previous treaty. I ask, what reliance you have for aid with treaty? The answer is, that it will be her interest. And, sir, it is her interest to give that aid without a treaty.

I have now gone through this tedious discussion. I have trespassed on your patience more than I wished, although, from the lateness of the hour, much has been omitted of what I ought to have said. I have endeavored to show that, under the existing circumstances, we are now actually at war, and have no choice but manly resistance or vile submission. That the possession of this country by France is dangerous to other nations, but fatal to us. That it forms a natural and necessary part of our empire; that, to use the strong language of the gentleman near me, it is joined to us by the hand of the Almighty, and that we have no hope of obtaining it by treaty. If, indeed, there be any such hope, it must be by adopting the resolutions offered by my honorable friend. Sir, I wish for peace—I wish the negotiation may succeed, and therefore I strongly urge you to adopt those resolutions. But though you should adopt them, they alone will not insure success. I have no hesitation in saying that you ought to have taken possession of New Orleans and the Floridas the instant your treaty was violated. You ought to do it now. Your rights are invaded—confidence in negotiation is vain; there is therefore no alternative but force. You are exposed to imminent present danger. You have the prospect of great future advantage. You are justified by the clearest principles of right. You are urged by the strongest motives of policy. You are commanded by every sentiment of national dignity. Look at the conduct of America in her infant years, when there was no actual invasion of right, but only a claim to invade. She resisted the claim; she spurned the insult. Did we then hesitate? Did we then wait for foreign alliance? No; animated with the spirit, warmed with the soul of freedom, we threw our oaths of allegiance in the face of our Sovereign, and committed our fortunes and our fate to the God of battles. We then were subjects. We had not then attained to the dignity of an independent Republic. We then had no rank among the nations of the earth. But we had the spirit which deserved that elevated station. And now that we have gained it, shall we fall from our honor?

Sir, I repeat to you that I wish for peace—real, lasting, honorable peace. To obtain and secure this blessing, let us by a bold and decisive conduct convince the Powers of Europe that we are determined to defend our rights; that we will not submit to insult; that we will not bear degradation. This is the conduct which becomes a generous people. This conduct will command the respect of the world. Nay, sir, it may rouse all Europe to a proper sense of their situation. They see that the balance of power on which their liberties depend, is, if not destroyed, in extreme danger. They know that the dominion of France has been extended by the sword over millions who groan in the servitude of their new masters. These unwilling subjects are ripe for revolt. The empire of the Gauls is not like that of Rome, secured by political institutions. It may yet be broken. But whatever may be the conduct of others, let us act as becomes ourselves. I cannot believe with my honorable colleague, that three-fourths of America are opposed to vigorous measures. I cannot believe that they will meanly refuse to pay the sums needful to vindicate their honor and support their independence. Sir, this is a libel on the people of America. They will disdain submission to the proudest Sovereign on earth. They have not lost the spirit of seventy-six. But, sir, if they are so base as to barter their rights for gold, if they are so vile that they will not defend their honor, they are unworthy of the rank they enjoy, and it is no matter how soon they are parcelled out among better masters.

My honorable friend from Pennsylvania, in opening this debate, pledged himself and his friends to support the Executive Government if they would adopt a manly conduct. I have no hesitation to renew that pledge. Act as becomes America, and all America will be united in your support. What is our conduct? Do we endeavor to fetter and trammel the Executive authority? Do we oppose obstacles? Do we raise difficulties? No. We are willing to commit into the hands of the Chief Magistrate the treasure, the power, and the energies of the country. We ask for ourselves nothing. We expect nothing. All we ask is for our country. And although we do not believe in the success of treaty, yet the resolutions we move, and the language we hold, are calculated to promote it.

I have now performed, to the best of my power, the great duty which I owed to my country. I have given that advice which in my soul I believe to be the best. But I have little hope that it will be adopted. I fear that by feeble councils we shall be exposed to a long and bloody war. This fear is, perhaps, ill founded, and if so I shall thank God that I was mistaken. I know that in the order of his Providence, the wisest ends frequently result from the most foolish measures. It is our duty to submit ourselves to his high dispensations. I know that war, with all its misery, is not wholly without advantage. It calls forth the energies of character, it favors the manly virtues, it gives elevation to sentiment, it produces national union, generates patriotic love, and infuses a just sense of national honor. If, then, we are doomed to war, let us meet it as we ought; and when the hour of trial comes, let it find us a band of brothers.

Sir, I have done; and I pray to Almighty God that this day's debate may eventuate in the prosperity, the freedom, the peace, the power, and the glory of our country.

Mr. WRIGHT (in explanation) said, the gentleman who spoke last had misstated his expressions and sentiments; he had stated that he (Mr. W.) had held forth the idea that we should petition France for a redress of grievances, as we had in our colonial state petitioned Great Britain.

Mr. MORRIS said he had not expressed himself so—it was not his intention to convey any such meaning.

Mr. WRIGHT.—The gentleman has retracted and I am satisfied; though he did certainly so couch his language as to leave an impression of that abject kind.

Mr. TRACY moved a division of the question.

Mr. WRIGHT said the question was incapable of division, as it was on striking out all that follows the word resolved.

Mr. S. T. MASON said as the gentleman appeared disposed to create a debate on a subject of no importance, at that hour of the day, (half past seven p. m.) he would move for an adjournment.

A division was then called for, and, upon counting, the VICE PRESIDENT declared the numbers twelve and twelve; that the House was equally divided, and that he was against an adjournment.

Mr. ANDERSON asked if the President of the Senate meant to say there were only twelve for an adjournment? He was answered in the affirmative. Mr. A. demanded a division, and upon counting, it appeared there were thirteen for adjourning and twelve against it. Adjourned.

state of his health, the Senate proceeded to the choice of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being collected and counted, the whole number were found to be 21, of which 11 make a majority :

Mr. BRADLEY had 18; Mr. MORRIS 2; Mr. LOGAN 1.

Consequently the honorable STEPHEN R. BRADLEY was elected President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and acquaint him that, on account of the indisposition of the Vice President, the Senate have elected the honorable STEPHEN R. BRADLEY President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered, That the Secretary make a like communication to the House of Representatives.

Mr. T. FOSTER presented the petition of Aaron Man, praying the remission of the impost duties on certain damaged articles therein mentioned; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 23d instant, the bill, entitled "An act in addition to, and in modification of, the propositions contained in the act, entitled 'An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes,'" reported it without amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the transfer of the duties of supervisor to any other office," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, LOGAN, and COCKE, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force 'An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,' and for other purposes,'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BALDWIN, CLINTON, and COCKE, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill to alter the time for holding the court of the United States in Kentucky district, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for continuing in force a law, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 24th instant, the bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress, reported it without amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to make Beaufort, the City of Washington, and Passamaquoddy, ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of St. Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario, and the appointment of a surveyor at Nanjemoy;" a bill, entitled "An act for erecting a light-house at the entrance of Penobscot bay, or any other place in its vicinity that may be deemed preferable by the Secretary of the Treasury;" a bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia,'" a bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee;" a bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States,'" and a bill, entitled "An act concerning the salt springs on the waters of the Wabash river;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

MISSISSIPPI QUESTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions respecting the indisputable right of the United States to the free navigation of the Mississippi, together with the proposed amendment thereto.

Mr. ANDERSON (of Tennessee) said he rose with much diffidence, after the very able discussion which the subject had already undergone; after so many men distinguished among the first in our country had treated it with so much ability he could not expect to furnish many new facts or observations on the subject. But coming from that part of the country which is particularly interested in the discussion, he felt himself particularly bound to offer a few remarks, which some erroneous statements that had fallen in debate, from the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WHITE,) particularly called for. He would, while he was up, endeavor to add a few observations on the resolutions.

The first of the resolutions appeared to him to be introduced merely with a view to involve the members who were opposed to hostile measures in a dilemma. It was the assertion of a truth which no one would deny, but it was connected with other resolutions or assertions, which must from propriety bring the whole under a negative vote. Taking the naked proposition that we have a right to the place of deposit, we all agree; that it has been suspended, we are equally agreed; but there we stop; by prefacing their resolutions with these truths, they expect either to induce us to vote for other things repugnant to our judgment, or afford room for the imputation of wrong motives and clamor abroad. But we are not to be led astray in this way, nor are the people of this country to be so deceived. On the first organization of the Government, the most earnest attention was directed to that river; and it is now as much an object of the care of Government as at any period since we have been an independent people. Gentlemen have not, therefore, represented the matter with that candor which the seriousness of the subject demanded. The navigation of the Mississippi has not been infringed on the present occasion, though the arguments of all, and the assertions of some, went to the extreme on that point. The river, he repeated, was and continues to be open, and he could not discover the utility of our declaring our right to the free navigation when we are in full unmolested possession of the right. He could indeed discover something beside utility; he could see a design no wise founded. The gentlemen expected with them the votes of the Western members; they expected to play upon our passions, and to place us between the danger of unpopularity and the sense of personal feeling, in a case of a critical nature. But gentlemen would find themselves mistaken to the utmost; though he felt himself in common with other Western members, responsible to his constituents, yet he would on all occasions where the sense of right impressed itself strongly on him, risk popularity to do right. On this occasion he saw no danger of his popularity, because, although he was aware that the people whom he represented were dissatisfied, they respected their Government and themselves too much to countenance any means that were not honorable and just, to obtain the deposit right.

The resolutions call upon us to declare the deprivation of the right of deposit to be hostile to our honor and interests. On this there were a variety of opinions; and it appears to be agreed (for it was not contradicted by any) that the act of an individual unauthorized cannot be either a cause of war, or the act of the Government of which he is an officer. No gentleman has positively declared the act to be authorized by Spain. We have the best evidence that the case will admit of, that it has not been authorized. As the act of an individual, therefore, it cannot affect the honor of this country. That her interests are affected is agreed on all hands; but then the due course of proceeding has been adopted, and redress is to be expected. If it should be denied us, we have our remedy, and it is then that it will become a point of honor. But now, as had been well said by his friend from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) if we were to rashly declare the act of the individual contrary to our national honor, we could not retrograde; and if Spain should not do us justice, he trusted that we should then take our strong ground, and not give way a step. This would be the effect. Gentlemen do not know the American character—they underrate it: there is not that levity in it which gentlemen suppose, capable of being lightly led astray. The character of America is fixed, and when real necessity calls for their exertions, the people will require no artificial excitement.

It is said that the tenure we hold by is uncertain, and it was not consistent with our dignity. This was the ground upon which all the art and ingenuity of the gentleman who framed the resolutions, and for which he is so much distinguished, is founded; it is calculated to seize upon the passions of Western men by a show of solicitude for the security of their rights and prosperity. But, however ingenious the contrivance, the deception upon which it is founded must destroy all its intended effect; for the facts upon which it rests for support must first be acknowledged before the conclusions can follow. And the notion of dignity with which the idea is connected must lead to a suspicion that something more is meant than bare right or justice, because in them alone true dignity rests.

The next point is, that we must be secured in this our absolute right. He would ask, was hostility and invasion of a neighbor's territory compatible with dignity, or the means calculated to give us this security? We all agree upon the necessity of the right, and of its permanent security. We differ very widely upon the mode by which we are to establish this security. This point had been dwelt on with very great labor by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and discussed with particular splendor of language, and in a variety of views, by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MORRIS;) but, upon testing the eloquence and ingenuity of the gentlemen by simple facts, and comparing their erroneous conceptions of the Western people with the labor they have employed to force arguments from extraneous sources, the only result that remains, is, that the gentlemen are very ingenious and very eloquent, but not at all convincing. For, with all the pains they have taken to enlighten us, they have not produced a single reason why we should depart, on this occasion, from the course which had been ever pursued as the wisest policy by our Government. They had not given us the remotest ground of justifiable hope that, even if we were to adopt their views, we should be more likely to obtain our object in that shape. The gentlemen had invoked us to descend the river, but they had not told us what we should gain, nor even counted on the difficulties of the very first part of their project. They had kept out of sight (what no wise man in public affairs will ever neglect the consideration of) the chances of adversity or disappointment, from natural or accidental causes. They had not calculated even the consequences of a war which must be the inevitable result—which would deprive us in the first place of our treaty right, and which, even after war had taken place, and lives and money wasted, would leave us under the necessity of treating at last.

Having so far stated his exceptions to the leading features of the resolutions, he would not undertake to follow the gentlemen on the other side through all those mazes in which they had endeavored to perplex the subject and bewilder the House, but he would offer a few observations on some detached points. A gentleman from Delaware had, he conceived, thrown out an unwarrantable and indecorous insinuation that there was a disposition in some of the members of that House to throw themselves at the footstool of the First Consul. That gentleman should know that such a disposition could not be countenanced if it were conceived; and it would be doing injustice to his understanding to suppose that he had misunderstood the sentiments uttered by any gentleman. The uniform sentiment entertained and expressed countenanced no such mean or dishonorable purpose; our object is to demand justice and redress for violated rights, and the security of those rights held under a treaty which had its existence prior to the treaty of cession from Spain to France. This was the usual course. What the motive of the gentleman was who had made an insinuation so improper he would not in that place express, but he had an opinion of that motive. We are told, as a reason why we should seize upon New Orleans, that it belongs to France. This he conceived to be rather a sound reason why we should not attack it; for the suspension of our right is the act of a Spanish officer. The gentleman says, the Spaniards mean to usurp the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi. This is no doubt an artful mode of addressing the passions of the Western people; but facts here overturn the most artful insinuations. The navigation of the Mississippi is not even brought into question. No obstruction has been so much as attempted to the navigation of that river. The sum of the injury and the dispute is the infringement of a right of deposit, and that granted only for a limited time, at the place where it is suspended.

He says the western people will not wait for negotiation. He could not conceive upon what kind of instinct or intelligence gentlemen could pretend to know the sentiments and character of the western people better than those who lived among them, and who immediately represented them. When did that part of the country manifest a disregard to the Union, or the peace of their country? Did they not suffer their country to be cut in twain by the Treaty of Holstein, and one half ceded to the Indians, and did they not suffer all the attendant evils patiently? For what end? Because the public good required it.

From time to time, he had heard in that House and in other places, the most wanton and cruel aspersions cast upon the people of the western country. He knew not how gentlemen could reconcile their pretensions of regard for the western people, with the odious imputations which were constantly cast upon their attachment. The whole of the opposition appeared to concur in their illiberality towards the western people, at the very moment they were professing so much zeal for their good. The late President of the United States had in a most unwarrantable manner told him, that the western people were ready to hold out their hands to the first foreigner that should offer them an alliance; the same sentiment is echoed here, only in different terms. But such vile imputations attach not to the western people, but to those who employed them. The western people are Americans, who wasted the spring-tide and summer of their days in the cause of their country; men who, having spent their patrimony in establishing their country's independence, travelled to the wilderness, to seek a homestead for themselves and children. Was it honorable, was it consistent with those labored efforts for their good, which we are told actuate gentlemen, to calumniate them in so unworthy a fashion? Gentlemen appear by their gestures to deny that they have been guilty of this calumny. But my charge against them is not of that evasive or double character which they deal in; the words they have used I have taken down—they are, "The French would draw the western people into an alliance." "The western people would be influenced by the insidious emissaries of France." "Corruption would find its way among them, and be transferred even to that floor." Is this not calumny of the darkest hue? Is this the way in which six hundred thousand men are to be stigmatized? Men, a greater proportion of whom are soldiers who fought for the independence of America, than ever was to be found in the whole State (Delaware) to which the gentleman belongs.

Another gentleman from that State (Mr. WELLS) had said yesterday, that the arguments from this side of the House had only tended to confirm him in the opinion which he had originally conceived. It was not the first time that he had heard this little species of argument employed; the gentlemen who are now in the minority, have been often obliged to their opponents for supplying them with this kind of conviction; it was too poor a species of consolation to them for him to entertain the least desire of depriving them of it.

Yet, with all this disrespect for the western people, they tell us that they are their only friends; that after we have convinced them of the correctness of their opinions, we ought to confide in those whom we have convinced without intending it; that though we are ourselves convinced of the propriety of negotiation, although a majority of that Senate, and the Executive, had already determined upon it, we should listen to those gentlemen who say that corrupt influence will find its way to this floor from the western country, and undo all we have done to adopt what they call measures of energy. Gentlemen have mistaken both their own powers of conversion, and the mode of argument which they have adopted to convert us, or to inspire confidence in their professions among the western people. We are always ready to defend our country when occasion calls, with something better than words; but we know, that if there is honor in defending our country in battle, there is both honor and virtue in defending it by prudence, without dishonor.

This mode of defence he found contemplated in the resolutions offered as substitutes. The gentleman, (Mr. ROSS,) had indeed, as is usual with him, upon the most desperate subject, made a very ingenious speech; but it was so much perplexed by subtlety, that like the Gordian knot it appeared incapable of being untied but by the sword. He hoped, however, it would not require an Alexander to achieve it.

During twelve years, eight of which one of the first men the world ever saw, or perhaps ever will see, presided over our affairs, the policy of pacific negotiation prevailed in our councils; a policy somewhat more hostile in its aspect was attempted by his successor, but still negotiation succeeded negotiation, and success attended perseverance. In the early stages of our existence, before we were yet a nation, it is indeed true that we drank of the cup of humiliation, even to the dregs; it was the natural effect of our dependent situation; of the prejudices that bound us, and from which great violence was necessary, and was employed to detach us. Such humiliation would not befit us now; no motives exist to demand or justify it: we were then a part of another nation, and connected with another Government; we began by petition in the terms of abjectness and humility, which are incidental to subjects of monarchs; which are always necessary, in order to conceal the spirit and the presumption, of which monarchs are always jealous in their subjects; but abject as we appeared, the very temper and phrase of humility deceived our oppressor into a belief that we were too lowly to entertain the manly temper of resistance against oppression. Yet our precursory and reiterated humility did not unnerve our arms nor subdue our minds, when it became necessary to fling off the trammels of oppression. The result, we now enjoy. When that very Power from which we had detached ourselves, refused to carry her treaty into execution, did we then go to war? She held several of our fortresses; we were entitled by every right of nature, and the usage of nations, to seize upon them; not like the right of deposit, a privilege enjoyed on the territory of another, but fortresses held, and in military array on our own territory. Did we then make war? No, we negotiated; and when another Power subsequently attacked us, we pursued the same course with the like success. The gentleman (Mr. Ross) has told us that when President WASHINGTON came into office, he would not have negotiated for the Mississippi, had he not found the negotiation already begun. The gentleman has not told us upon what authority he states this, or how he came to possess the knowledge of a fact of which all others are ignorant; a fact, too, contradictory of his practice through life, and of the principles of that legacy which he left to his country.

It was not expected that he should, coming from the interior of America, be competent to discuss the policy and the balance of power in Europe. Indeed, if it were not from an apprehension of too much presumption, he would venture to say it was the height of absurdity to introduce their policy on a question like the present. We had been told also of the Romans, that they never negotiated but on the line. This would of course lead us, if anything, to imitate the insolent and dominating spirit of Roman conquest, the part of the Roman policy above all others most to be deprecated and avoided. He would rather prefer the policy of the ancient Republics of Greece, whose practice was negotiation in preference to war. The policy of all Republics, is in their nature pacific. The contrary is the character of other forms of government. In monarchies and aristocracies, the rulers never suffer, and the people, who suffer, have no influence or control. In Republics, the people, who likewise suffer, have their due weight, and happiness being their interest, they are ever averse to war.

If European lessons can be of use, those of Britain and Spain, in the time of Sir Robert Walpole, should instruct us: that Minister had been repeatedly called upon to declare war, in consequence of aggressions, or alleged aggressions, of Spain; after two years he was forced into it reluctantly, but not until after several embassies had been sent and failed. Britain has had few Ministers equal to him as a politician. But history will tell you, that at the peace which followed, no notice was taken of the spoiliations for which the war commenced. If Great Britain then failed, what are we to expect from a war? If we were to believe all that gentlemen insinuated yesterday, it would seem to be our intention to humble ourselves in dust and ashes, at the feet of the Emperor of the Gauls; and to encourage this idea of our humiliation, the gentlemen tell us, that he has conquered all Europe, and that his mandate is the law. To insinuations of this unbecoming kind, he would tell the gentlemen in the words of his friend from Georgia, (Mr. JACKSON,) that in defence of our country and its rights, we will, when we draw the sword, throw away the scabbard. Gentlemen thus menace us only to make us the cowards which they fictitiously describe us. But he would call their recollection to our Revolution, where a people unarmed, undisciplined, half part disaffected, asserted their own liberties; without money or visible resources, attacked by the then first nation of Europe, aided by auxiliaries from Germany, and with the first naval force on the ocean. Need the gentlemen be told we beat that great nation? The gentleman, none of the gentlemen on that side, know the people of whom they talk. I have walked more in the common walks of life, than those who look down with disdain on the hardy husbandman, and who consider all bliss, as well as all power, the peculiar right of an imaginary superiority, or an accidental capacity for luxurious extravagance. I saw the army which achieved our liberties, and often have I traced their naked footsteps through the snow by the blood which gushed from their lacerated but untired feet. Men who endure, and are capable of enduring such hardships, possess spirits which men accustomed to slight and degrade them cannot conceive. It is upon such men, and not on the disciples of luxury and frivolity, that America must depend for her liberties; it is of such men the ranks of her armies will be composed, and such are the men who compose the population of the western country. He knew this people, and that they wished for peace, though if justice required it, they would be in the ranks of battle, while those who asperse them would perhaps be at their toilettes. The resolutions substituted would accord with the wishes of his constituents, he would therefore support them. If negotiation fails, and we are compelled to the dernier resort, we should then see if those who are for resistance would unite, and make a common cause with us.

Mr. WHITE, (in explanation) said, that gentlemen had in the evaporation of passion distorted and misrepresented him; he owed it to the public and the Senate, to show that he would go as far as any one in his respect for the western country—he would go as far as the gentleman, or farther, What he alluded to, with regard to French influence over the western people, was, that they would by means of their commerce, obtain an influence over them.

Mr. ANDERSON said it gave him much pain to be obliged to show the gentleman that passion must have occasioned a total absence of memory or reflection, a conviction of error, which it would have been more generous in him to acknowledge than to aggravate. But since the gentleman did affect to Herod it, he must again tell him that it was not of commercial influence he first spoke; he did say “that corruption would find its way to the floor of that House.” What! commercial corruption in that House? No! How then? It must find its way by the corruption of the members which the Western country sends to Congress. If he had told the gentleman, that Delaware was under the influence of Great Britain, and that corruption had made its way from thence to the floor of that House, what indignation ought not the gentleman and his colleague have a right to feel!

Mr. S. T. MASON said, that if he were to consult the state of his health, he should not trouble the Senate with any remarks on the resolutions before them. But he had heard in the course of debate, certain observations, such strange and paradoxical arguments; insinuations and assertions of such a nature as ought not to be passed unnoticed. Doubtful whether his strength would sustain him through the whole scope which in better health he should take, he would endeavor to limit his arguments to a few of the most prominent particulars, which excited his attention, and to the delivery of his reasons for preferring the substitute propositions of his friend from Kentucky, (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) to the original resolutions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

In presenting himself to the attention of the Senate, his voice, feeble at the best of times, would, after the boisterous declamation and crackling of eloquence with which they had been yesterday stunned, demand particular indulgence. Feeble as he was, however, he was not daunted; objects and sounds often present themselves to the senses which surprise without exciting curiosity, and confound without being comprehensible; mountains of sophistry, like mountains of vapor, fade before the simple and inoffensive rays of reason and truth.

The amendment on your table is to be preferred to the resolutions first proposed, because they breathe a spirit more consistent with the practice of civilized nations, and more congenial with the character of the American people; they propose to effect what is reasonable, without tending to injustice or impolicy; they are the substitutes for propositions novel, unnecessary, and extraordinary; such as this body has no power to adopt. The amendments go to obtain all that is required by the most prudent considerations; they provide a Constitutional force adequate for any exigency within, and a force for exterior service, should it be found necessary to call it forth; we shall have a body of eighty thousand militia, for home service, and a corps of volunteers for a legal period, and which might be marched out of our limits; arsenals on the spot, provided with all the stores requisite for actual service, should they be required. Resolved on peace, unless forced from our rights: then prepared for war.

The resolutions first offered are of a very different character, they seek a very different end; they tell us directly, you must go and make war, but they do not furnish the means. Does the gentleman not know that the militia cannot be sent on the service of invasion into the territory of their neighbors? Does he not know that we are destitute of any authority whatever to send them? The Constitution gives Congress the power over the militia to “suppress insurrections, and repel invasions,” but nothing farther.

The amendments provide for the exigency, if it should ever arise, and in an adequate manner. It is proposed to enrol volunteer corps, for such a length of time as may be expedient or necessary for the service, and to march on any service which may be required.

He had heard in the debate, many professions of confidence in the Executive. He was very glad to hear such unusual expressions from that quarter. However, it was entitled to its due weight—what that was he would not inquire; but this he would say, that this unexpected ebullition of confidence went very much farther than he should be disposed to carry his confidence in any man or any President whatever. Gentlemen tell us that they are willing to entrust to the Executive the power of going to war, or not, at his discretion. Wonderful indeed is this sudden disposition to confidence! Why do not gentlemen give away that which they have some authority or right to bestow? Who gave them the power to vest in any other authority than in Congress the right of declaring war? The framers of this Constitution had too much experience to entrust such a power to any individual; they early and wisely foresaw, that though there might be men too virtuous to abuse such a power, that it ought not to be entrusted to any; and nugatory would be the authority of the Senate, if we could assume the right of transferring our Constitutional functions to any man or set of men. It was a stretch of confidence which he would not trust to any President that ever lived, or that will live. He could not as one, without treason to the Constitution, consent ever to relinquish the right of declaring war to any man, or men, beside Congress.

We are told that negotiation is not the course which is proper for us to pursue. But to this he should reply, that such was the usage of all civilized nations; and, however gentlemen might attempt to whittle away the strong ground taken by his friend from New York, he had shown, in a manner not to be shaken, that negotiation before a resort to the last scourge of nations, is the course most consistent with good policy, as well as with universal practice. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had indeed told us that Great Britain had departed from that practice; unfortunately for Great Britain and the gentleman's argument, he told us, at the same time, that she had sustained a most serious injury by her injustice and precipitation. She went to war to seek retribution, and after fighting a while, she left off, and forgot to ask the retribution for which she went to war! And this is the example held up for our imitation; because Great Britain violated the law of nations, we are called upon to do so too! We are told also, that Great Britain commenced war during our Revolution, against the Dutch, without any previous notification; that she did the same in the late war with France, and in both cases seized on the ships in her harbors; that is, like a professional bully, she struck first, and then told them she would fight them—and this is the gracious example held up to us.

The merits of the different propositions consisted in this, that by the amendments we propose to seek the recourse of pacific nations—to follow up our own uniform practice; we pursue, in fact, the ordinary and rational course. The first resolutions go at once to the point of war. This was openly and fairly acknowledged by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. G. MORRIS.) The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. ROSS) indeed, told us that it is not war—it was only going and taking peaceable possession of New Orleans! He did not before think the gentleman felt so little respect for the Senate, or estimated their understandings so much inferior to his own, as to call such a measure an act of peace! How did the gentleman mean to go, and how take peaceable possession? Would he march at the head of the posse comitatus? No! he would march at the head of fifty thousand militia, and he would send forth the whole naval and regular force, armed and provided with military stores. He would enter their island, set fire to their warehouses, and bombard their city, desolate their farms and plantations, and having swept all their habitations away, after wading through streams of blood, he would tell those who had escaped destruction, we do not come here to make war on you—we are a very moderate, tender-hearted kind of neighbors, and are come here barely to take peaceable possession of your territory! Why, sir, this is too naked not to be an insult to the understanding of a child!

But the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) did not trifle with the Senate in such a style; he threw off the mask at once, and in a downright, manly way, fairly told us that he liked war—that it was his favorite mode of negotiating between nations; that war gave dignity to the species—that it drew forth the most noble energies of humanity! That gentleman scorned to tell us that he wished to take peaceable possession. No! He could not snivel; his vast genius spurned huckstering; his mighty soul would not bear to be locked up in a petty warehouse at New Orleans; he was for war, terrible, glorious havoc! He tells you plainly, that you are not only to recover your rights, but you must remove your neighbors from their possessions, and repel those to whom they may transfer the soil; that Bonaparte's ambition is insatiable; that he will throw in colonies of Frenchmen, who will settle on your frontier for thousands of miles round about, (when he comes there;) and he does not forget to tell you of the imminent dangers which threaten our good old friends the English. He tells you that New Orleans is the lock, and you must seize upon the key, and shut the door against this terrible Bonaparte, or he will come with his legions, and, as Gulliver served the Lilliputians, wash you off the map. Not content, in his great care for your honor and glory, as a statesman and a warrior, he turns prophet to oblige you—your safety in the present year or the next, does not satisfy him—his vast mind, untrammelled by the ordinary progressions of chronology, looks over ages to come, with a faculty bordering on omniscience, and conjures us to come forward and regulate the decrees of Providence at ten thousand years distance.

That gentleman, Mr. President, is a surprising genius—an amazingly great man—he could never have been intended for this plain, unpowdered republican era, in which we live satisfied, but which must be a perpetual source of discontent to him. But it is not for us to arraign Providence! We are told that, in the immensity of the universe, so unbounded is the space it occupies, that even this little ball of earth which we inhabit, is so comparatively insignificant and minute, that it would not be missed from the great galaxy; and yet we are told that, in this little speck in the creation, Omnipotence tired in six days and rested the seventh. In the construction of so immense a system, it would not then seem surprising if, in the general confusion, souls had been shuffled into bodies never designed for them, or thrown by chance into ages for which their stupendous faculties were not fitted; who can say that the soul of that gentleman was not intended for some ancient sage or hero, or for some sage of future ages immensely remote, when America may have gone through a long career of greatness and degeneracy, after the manner of other nations! Such a soul, so heroic, and so hot for blood, would do honor to the Crusades; who can say that he was not intended for that age, and that the fall of Jerusalem was not owing to the unhappy accident of his being born out of his time, and in the wrong country!

The gentleman has, with great emphasis, repeated, that Florida must be ours. That this may be the case, at some remote period, is not in the order of human events improbable. The natural progression of population would seem to indicate such an event. The geographical situation of that country has long rendered such a theory familiar to speculative minds. But the gentleman says it must be ours now. Hence it appears that the deposit at New Orleans is really not the object which the gentleman's great mind contemplated. But how is Florida to be obtained? What injury have we sustained in Florida? Presently we shall be told we must have Louisiana; then the gold mines of Mexico—these would be very good things, if come by honestly—then Potosi—then St. Domingo, with their sugar, coffee, and all the rest. These likewise are all very good and comfortable things in their way, honorably and justly obtained. But what have we to do with the territories of other people? Have we not enough of our own? Have we not more than we can cultivate or sell?

If we suffer this rapacious spirit to prevail, Mr. President, what is to be our character? Our fate is not difficult to foresee. The nations of the Old World will become jealous of our unjustifiable ambition—they will combine against us—they will humble and curb us. The British belt, that binds us to the North, will be drawn tight upon us. Should it appear that we seek to elbow out every European nation who possesses colonies on this side of the Atlantic, then would the sanguinary passions which pant for havoc and disorder, find ample scope for war and desolation; we should see those Powers of Europe, lately armed against each other, combined against us.

But it is not with our European neighbors only that the fervid impatience of the gentleman would embroil us; not satisfied with Florida, and the lock and key of Louisiana, he launches us into the turbulent sea of European politics, and sets us to tilting for that phantom, the balance of power! Switzerland, Holland, Italy, Germany, Portugal, and Spain, are severally described as swallowed up by all-devouring France; and not only are we to join in the crusade for restoring the lost balance of power, but we are invited to do more—we are invoked to come forth and tell the nations of Europe, that America is a young and manly nation, that we are eager to restore that balance of power; and that we will do ourselves the honor of leading the van in a new coalition!

Is any member of this House prepared for this? Is this the wish or will of the people of America? It requires no answer. We find the gentleman beginning with the deposit at New Orleans, and erecting an immense foundation for mischief on the rash act of a Spanish officer, in refusing us the right to deposit our produce in their territory. We are then carried back to anterior transactions, the capture of ships and the detention of seamen in the South American colonies of Spain; we are then alarmed about the dangers on our frontiers from a French colony: but at length the secret comes out—we are told that we must go to war to restrain the overgrown power of France! The gentlemen pant for war, and care not for what or with whom; they pursue war with a deplorable infatuation, and the most charitable construction that can be put upon their conduct is, that they know not what they do.

But we are not to be seduced from the sober policy which our situation and our experience commands. Under that illustrious character so often alluded to, we are told no aggression was ever submitted to with impunity; that there was no blockade of the North river, Savannah, or the Delaware. He would tell the gentleman that there was a blockade more serious and extensive than the blockade of any or all of those rivers: the ocean was put in a state of blockade to us; our ships were captured and confiscated; our citizens taken from on board our ships and put in irons; they were put on board British ships-of-war, and compelled to fight the battles of despotism against men who were engaged in the defence of their country, against men fighting in the cause of liberty, and for whom a lively sympathy was felt on account of the services rendered to America by them in our Revolution. Was this no injury? Yet the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DAYTON) tells us the time was, when, had a single American citizen been oppressed or injured, the national honor would have been roused and asserted in his defence! What a wonderful discovery. It is to be lamented that it is all a fiction—that it has no existence but in the gentleman's unconscious imagination. Was it when the commander of a British frigate, the British captain, Pigot, stopped the American citizen, Captain Jessup, at sea, and because he complained of having his men impressed, tied him up and flogged him at his gangway, that the sense of national dignity was displayed? or when else? If the gentleman could tell, he ought, and he should be glad to hear the news. He insisted that the wrongs done to us since the peace of 1783, by the British, were more deep, dishonorable, and afflicting than any other, or than has happened, or can happen, in consequence of the affair at New Orleans. Yet war was not advocated when Britain insulted and wronged us; recourse was had to measures of a pacific, and of a more certain and efficacious nature. Certain commercial propositions were brought forward to counteract and coerce, by her commercial nerves, the nation that had wronged us; a procedure very different from the military peace-march to New Orleans. In the midst of the discussion of these resolutions, President WASHINGTON appointed Mr. Jay to proceed upon a negotiation; and the propositions were given up to await the issue of negotiation. In all negotiations which we have undertaken with sincerity, we have succeeded. WASHINGTON did all that the most pacific policy required to prevent war; he did so with sincerity; and notwithstanding the adverse counsels by which he was sometimes deceived, it was his favorite principle to avoid foreign alliances, and to study the arts of peace with diligence and constancy. It must be recollected by many persons in that House, that in a correspondence which took place during the discussions on the British Treaty, speaking of those who opposed that Treaty, he called them the "friends of war and confusion." How far the title was proper is not here to be inquired; but it is put to their consideration, whether gentlemen who oppose negotiation and advocate taking peaceable possession of a foreign territory by force of arms, are or not entitled to the epithets. But whether the gentlemen agree on this point, whether they profess a peaceable inclination in the invasion of foreign territory with arms in their hands, or openly avow their design to be actual hostility, is very immaterial to the public, who will appreciate the consistency of their pretensions and their propositions.

It had been correctly stated, that the true course of our policy always has been, and always ought to be, to pursue negotiation, in preference to any species of menace or hostility. It was more consistent with a confidence in our own resolution, for moderation in difficulty is always the true criterion of courage. The course now proposed by the amendments of his friend from Kentucky was the same that had been formerly adopted. When the proceedings of the Legislature were arrested by Jay's mission, this was the course. Eighty thousand militia were voted, and the country was placed in its true position for defence, a reliance upon the patriotism and courage of free-men. The same course was adopted with regard to France on a later occasion—and in both the effect was answerable to the intention—we obtained peace by negotiation. Those who advocate war measures now recommended very different measures in the case of British aggression. One gentleman, from New Jersey, indeed, disclaims any merit on this score; he washes his hands of all the sin which attaches to a love of peace; he disavows and rejects such a grovelling system; born a soldier, the language of war is to him the harmony of the spheres; war is never mentioned without stirring up his proud recollection of those wonderful achievements in which he partook his share of glory in the blood-stained field; his sympathies are aroused, like the sympathies of an old coach-horse at the crack of a whip! It is a kind of instinct—no one can account for it—but that it is a natural propensity—it bears an analogy to love—it is an indescribable something, and great warriors have been ever great lovers—indeed, all the ancient knights were in love as a matter of course. The passion for war lasts as long as life, but that of love (from a natural cause) is not always as durable; the former seems already predominant with the gentleman from New Jersey, and has betrayed him into an unguarded concession; while vaunting of his military achievements, he has told us that he was defending the State of New York, when my friend, who now represents that State with so much benefit to his country and honor to himself, (Mr. CLINTON,) was on his mother's lap, or in the egg-shell; this is making out the gentleman rather older than I expected he was, and is acknowledging a weight of years, that I should hardly have thought a man of his gallantry would have been willing to own before so numerous and elegant a collection of ladies as at this time honor us with their company. But we are told by another redoubtable knight, that we must have New Orleans whether the Spaniards will or not—no ceremony in his opinion is necessary—he says we want it, and therefore must have it. Thus, if a buck of high metal were to see a fine horse, he might tell the rider: Sir, that is a very excellent horse indeed; I want it, and you must alight; I do not mean to rob you, sir, but really you must dismount, and let me have the horse. A lady may like a fine transparent muslin, or a shawl, or brocade, or something else that is very fine and fashionable, she vows to heaven she must and will have it; they belong to the shopkeeper to be sure, but what does that signify, the lady wants them, and all she has to do is to knock the shopkeeper down and then gratify her wishes. Exactly parallel is the conduct recommended to us. If, indeed, we can obtain New Orleans in an honest way, if the man will sell his horse, or the shopkeeper his goods, why then we may have it; but we cannot become so insensible to justice, or to our true policy, as to invade and take the property of an ally before we have complained and demanded our rights, violated by an officer of that ally. If negotiation fails, it will then be justifiable in us to redress ourselves, and insist on our right; if our right is resisted, and further injury done, the laws and usages of nations will justify us in retaliating; and in such an event, which he did not expect, we might be justified in going farther and taking more. But this we could never do, or attempt, unless forced into a war. But as we are now called upon to act, nothing could be more unjust. We have heard of a right of ours under treaty being suspended, we know not by whom; all that we know is, that a Spanish officer has undertaken to do this. But without telling your wrongs to his Government, you are told to enter on the territory and spread fire, havoc, and desolation, among the unoffending and friendly inhabitants! Would the savage tribes of our wilderness do the like? They would not. You have just sent an Ambassador upon this very subject, and you are told he must carry with him in his hand an account of this invasion and ravage as his introduction to negotiate on friendly and pacific terms! We empower him to demand redress of what we have undertaken to redress ourselves. We ask for justice, and our recommendation is injustice. We ask the Spanish Government, Will you please to restore us our deposit? when we have not only taken it but the whole island. What would be the reception of our Minister under such circumstances? He would be sent back; and we should be told that they would try to take from us, by force, what we had usurped beyond our just claim. Such is the policy which gentlemen recommend.

Some gentlemen read us the newspapers; some private letters from God knows who; another tells us of the Prince of Parma, and the King of Etruria, and the Duke of Modena; that Spain is the actual aggressor—then that France is the real mover. Further, from the same source we learn that Lord Whitworth has arrived at Paris, and that the expedition of the French is suspended, because Great Britain wishes to purchase Louisiana. Thus it is demonstrated, by the gentlemen themselves, that they know not, or care not, what they are doing, and that they are desirous of acting in the dark; for, if we raise the sword, we know not whether it is to fall on the head of Spain, France, or England. If it should happen to be on the last, some gentlemen would certainly deplore their present impetuosity.

We have been told that Spain had no right to cede Louisiana to France; that she had ceded to us the privilege of deposit, and had therefore no right to cede her territory without our consent! Are gentlemen disposed to wage war in support of this principle? Because she has given us a little privilege—a mere indulgence on her territory—is she thereby constrained from doing anything forever with her immense possessions? No doubt, if the gentleman, (Mr. MORRIS,) were to be the negotiator on this occasion, he would say: "You mean to cede New Orleans; no, gentlemen, I beg your pardon, you cannot cede that, for we want it ourselves; and as to the Floridas, it would be very indiscreet to cede that, as, in all human probability, we shall want that also in less than five hundred years from this day; and then, as to Louisiana, you surely could not think of that, for in something less than a thousand years, in the natural order of things, our population will progress towards that place also."

If Spain has ceded those countries to France, the cession has been made with all the incumbrances and obligations to which it is subject by previous compact with us. Whether Bonaparte will execute these obligations with good faith, he could not say; but to say that Spain has no right to cede, is a bold assertion indeed. The people of America will not go along with such doctrines, for they lead to ruin alone. We are also told, that the power of the Chief Consul is so great, that he puts up and pulls down all the nations of the Old World at discretion, and that he can do so with us. Yet we are told by the wonderful statesman, who gives us this awful information, that we must go to war with this maker and destroyer of Governments. If, after the unceasing pursuit of empire and conquest, which is thus presented to us, we take possession of his territory, from the gentleman's own declarations, what are we to expect, only that this wonderful man, who never abandons an object—who thinks his own and the nation's honor pledged to go through whatever he undertakes—will next attack us? Does the gentleman think that this terrible picture, which his warm imagination has drawn, is a conclusive argument for proceeding to that war which he recommends?

The Senate, Mr. President, at this moment, presents a very extraordinary aspect; and by those not acquainted with our political affairs, it would appear a political phenomenon. Here we see a number of people from the Eastern States and the seaboard, filled with the most extreme solicitude for the interest and rights of the western and inland States; while the representatives of the Western people themselves appear to know nothing of this great danger, and to feel a full confidence in their Government. The former declaring that the Western people are all ready for revolt and open to seduction; the latter ignorant of any such disposition, and indignant at the disgrace which is thrown on their character. In their great loving kindness for the Western people, those new friends of theirs tell them that they are a simple people, who do not know what is good for them, and that they will kindly undertake to do this for them. From the contiguous States of South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky, (those States from which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, by his resolutions, proposes to draw the militia,) every member of this House is opposed to war; but from the East, (and one can scarcely refrain from laughing, to hear of the all-important representatives of the State of Delaware in particular,) such is the passion for the wonderful, or the absurd, there prevails the liveliest sensibility for the Western country!

Soon after the peace of 1783, our frontiers were in a situation where national feeling had much occasion for irritation. The British had not only retained their old garrisons on our territory, contrary to treaty, but they actually advanced upon us, and erected new. Yet such was the extreme sensibility of the Eastern States then, that they went to sleep in perfect composure; and their sensibility and their war rage was never roused until the British began to interfere with our commerce at sea; then indeed they began to rub their eyes, and to discover that there was some danger. But they continued still to feel very little for the Western people—perhaps they did not know them so well—they had not yet travelled over the Western lands!

These contradictions must be resolved by other than State interests; by other causes than any sufferings of particular States. They must be explained by events in times past, and by causes which do not belong to the interests or the happiness of the people. There are men in this country who entertain an incurable passion for war; there are some men who see no means by which their ambition can be gratified, but through the evils and distractions, the miseries and the discontents, inseparable from a state of war. There are, said he, such men. War leads to expense, and to discontent with the Government which creates it; war strengthens the hands of Executive power, and weakens the authority and the voice of the people; war multiplies the means of profusion and waste of the public treasures in contracts and jobs—it gives a preponderance to one branch of the Government over the rest. From the beginning of this Government, this struggle has been visible, where ambition has leagued with avarice against the interests of the people; and where there has been more pain and trouble occasioned by the incessant efforts of this combination, than all the other duties, cares, and incumbrances of Government. Perhaps some gentlemen do not act from a consciousness of such motives; perhaps some few may act from opinion, and without personal or ambitious views; some perhaps conscientiously think that it would be preferable to lodge all authority in the Executive, and to dispense with popular representation, or even ordinary legislation. Whatever might be the motives or the impressions of this few, this Government was not made for them; it was made for the many, and must be so administered.

He could have enlarged much more on what had fallen in debate, but his strength would not enable him to pursue the examination much further; he would, therefore, content himself with stating his reasons for preferring the substitute to the original resolutions.

This he considered to be a most favorable time for negotiation. We are told that Bonaparte never gives up an enterprise. He will not then give up St. Domingo; he has attacked it, he has been disconcerted, and is pledged to accomplish it at any sacrifice. Great as that colony is, and perhaps he does not think so much of it as in a commercial view it merits, but if, as has been said, he wishes to preserve it as a necessary means for the reduction of the West Indies, this must be the most favorable opportunity for pressing a negotiation. What may be attempted or expected from that negotiation he would not say, because it was not proper, in the present stage of proceedings.

He stated, that the original resolutions, by delegating to the President of the United States the power to invade the neighboring territory of an ally, with fifty thousand militia, and all our regular military force; whilst they betray the most outrageous spirit of hostility, they are evidently calculated to defeat all attempts at friendly negotiation, and, in two instances, most palpably violate the Constitution. To Congress the power of making war is confided by the Constitution—a power which they cannot transfer to the President or any other authority. Secondly, the militia can only be used by Congress “to suppress insurrections and repel invasions;” they have no power to send them without the limits of the United States upon any object of conquest, or to avenge any national wrongs or indignities, that we may be supposed to have suffered. The militia force, therefore, if collected, could not be used for the purposes expressed in those resolutions.

But, by the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, a greater force is to be held in a state of preparation; a part of these to be enlisted, or rather enrolled as volunteers, for a longer time of service than militia are liable to, and by the terms of their engagement may be marched anywhere that may be required of them by an act of Congress. Arsenals are to be built, and the arms and ammunition deposited in suitable situations, so that should war be unavoidable, everything is placed in a state of perfect preparation for such an event. And when Congress, with whom the power of war is lodged, may think proper to declare it, the declaration of war may be followed by an immediate and effectual movement. Thus, the resolutions proposed as an amendment, whilst they show more temper, moderation, and justice, will be more effectual, should we find it necessary to resort to the last means of settling national disputes; they are such as the powers of Congress are competent to, and by not attempting more, argue at sincerity of intention, which the others (from their very different character in this respect) may be suspected of wanting. Though the ostensible pretext of those resolutions was to secure the deposit at New Orleans, yet it was evident that their object was war at all events. These gentlemen seem to be all equally anxious for war, though they differ about the causes and inducements which should lead us to undertake it, and the means of pursuing it seems to have been very crudely digested indeed. War is all they want—is all they wish; set it once going, and it will work afterwards to suit their purpose; give them but war, they care not with whom, or for what.

Mr. COCKE.—The doctrines held by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) are curious. He tells us, Mr. President, that we must go to war for fear we may be compelled to go to war; that we must attack the Spaniards because they are weak; and we must attack the French because they are powerful; we must force our Western fellow-citizens into a war, from an apprehension that if we do not, they will go to war themselves, and become our most formidable enemies! This he supposed was what some people called oratory, but for which an honest man is at a loss to find a proper name. The love of peace he has declared to be a good reason for going to war; and this is more oratory. There was something said about a Duke of Parma and Hercules, but this he supposed was oratory also; it was hardly possible to be serious upon this kind of doings. The gentleman in the same speech told us that he did not know what the President was doing in this business; he has a bad memory for an orator, for it is but a few days since he was present at the nomination of James Monroe to proceed to Europe as Ambassador to negotiate on the subject; this was at least something, and more was expressed in the Message from the Executive on the nomination. Why, sir, oratory appears to me a heap of contradictions; fine words may, to be sure, be very diverting, but they are not half so well calculated for a republican people as matter of fact. The gentlemen, indeed, appeared to think very differently, for we have been accused of wishing to keep their arguments and speeches from going abroad, and to keep to ourselves, with closed doors, all their fine doings about the Prince of Parma and the Emperor of the Gauls, and about the prophecies of the gentleman to the Swiss so many years ago. He could assure gentlemen, that, for his own part, he entertained as little apprehension about their fine speeches as he did of the Prince of Parma, or the hero of Italy; and he believed his constituents generally thought about as much of them, if they thought of them at all.

But gentlemen tell us our rights are invaded, and that we must go down and attack the sluggish Spaniard; and that we should do this in time, before Bonaparte comes, and builds a chain of fortifications along your frontiers. How are the public to understand all these things? We must not negotiate, because the Spaniards are sluggards, and we must fight because Bonaparte, by the aid of that conjuring devil, which the gentleman talked of, is to build up a whole line of fortresses, all in one night, he supposed. These are the speeches which, we are told, we were afraid of letting go out to the public—in which everything is contradictory.

But how are we to account for this zeal for war, in those gentlemen now, who, not many years ago, were as violently bent on peace? They tell us, indeed, that there was a day when the character of America stood high, and when the poorest American individual could not be insulted with impunity; and that those were the days of WASHINGTON. Gentlemen have very bad memories, or they perhaps choose to forget. Do those gentlemen forget Dorchester's speech to the Indians; do they forget the possession of our forts on the lakes, contrary to treaty, when the savage Indians were daily murdering our citizens on the frontier, instigated by the British, when neither age nor sex was spared? What was the conduct of gentlemen then? Those things happened in the days of WASHINGTON, and where was the redress found? In war? Did we march an army to Montreal or Quebec? Did we even seize upon our own forts, in our own States, which they held? No. What then did WASHINGTON do, Mr. President? Why, sir, he did no more than we mean to do now; with a thousandth part of the provocation or injury, he negotiated. If any circumstances justified war, it was those. But even my friends did not then propose to resort to arms—they proposed a commercial war, in which no blood was to be shed. But what did those gentlemen who now bellow forth war? They opposed even a commercial retaliation; they deprecated the dangers of a war, and proposed negotiation, and sent an Ambassador.

The British Treaty was concluded—the gentlemen who now roar out war! war! then cried out peace! and eulogized that treaty. Yet, in the twenty-second article of that treaty, we find the gentlemen have furnished another contradiction; for that article says, that neither of the contracting parties shall order or authorize any acts of reprisal against the other, on complaint of injury, until a statement thereof shall be presented to the injuring party by the injured, verified by competent proof, and demand satisfaction, and not then unless redress is refused, or unreasonably delayed. This treaty was concluded under WASHINGTON, but it was also a part of a former treaty with Prussia, and of a subsequent treaty with the Dey of Algiers; the twenty-second article of the treaty with whom was to the same effect. And this also was a treaty, concluded by WASHINGTON, and all this was supported by the gentlemen who now drive at war. Where were Jupiter and Mars in that day? they were napping in the arms of some fuddled Bellona; while a grave Judge was sent from the Bench to the Court of St. James to kneel before her Majesty of England, to kiss her sacred hand, and to pray her most gracious intercession with her magnanimous husband to spare our frontiers from the scalping knife, and have pity on us. This was called asserting our dignity in those boasted days; we never heard of the poorest individual meeting protection; and the representative of our Republic was seen taking shelter under the royal robe, and aping the pomp and vanity of a vicious court and corrupt nobility.

The people of America, Mr. President, have had too much experience to be any longer deceived. Their eyes have been opened to the de-ceits which have been put upon them, and are now attempted again. They have on every occasion marked one prevailing feature of conduct in the party which now wish to stir up war; against every aggression of Great Britain they shut their eyes; in their sight the most flagrant acts of injustice from that quarter are either justified or palliated; in whatever situation we are placed, with respect to other Powers, the first consideration of this war party is, what is the interest of Great Britain on the subject? Every act of any Power not allied to Great Britain, or in any manner opposed to her, is magnified and aggravated; and in all their speeches we are sure to hear, either in the form of a direct proposal, or an hearsay insinuation, of an alliance offensive and defensive with England; we are menaced and flattered alternately with accounts of her Navy; we are taught to believe her Navy can destroy us, if we maintain our own rights, or if we prefer treating with others; while, if we have difference with Powers to which England is opposed, we are invited to embark in a new crusade with her, and to lead the van of her battles. The people see all these things, they have felt them, and can no longer be deceived.

Sir, while they guard against internal foes, the people are not indifferent to their rights, nor unwilling to maintain them at every hazard. The business of New Orleans is in the hands of the Executive, and the people confide in their own choice. If his efforts fail by negotiation, the people will not fail to unite with one voice and one arm at the call of the Government of their country.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, if this was an ordinary question, his indisposition would prevent his taking any part in the discussion; but as the Representative of a State, more than one-third of whose territory lies on the Western waters, and which has upon all occasions manifested the most anxious solicitude to preserve our right to the navigation of the river Mississippi, he felt himself bound to state to the Senate the reasons upon which he considered the propositions of his friend from Kentucky entitled to a preference to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. However irksome it may be to him, he will never shrink from the discharge of a public duty from personal considerations. Upon the present occasion, he would endeavor, as much as possible, to avoid a repetition of what had been said by others in favor of the amendment, and in opposition to the original resolutions. To make this the more certain, his observations should be more in the form of a reply to what had been said in support of the resolutions first offered, than a regular argument in favor of one proposition, or in opposition to the other. Had the gentleman who introduced this discussion dealt frankly with the Senate, or understood the views of his own friends, and at once informed us what nations he meant to go to war with, what the objects of the war were to be, and the extent of the proposed conquests, much time and trouble would have been saved.

When the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr.

SENATE.

Ross) opened his war project, his resentment appeared to be confined wholly to Spain; his sole object the securing the navigation of the Mississippi, and our right to a convenient place of deposit on that river. We were told by that gentleman, that we are bound to go to war for this right, which God and nature had given the Western people. What are we to understand by this right, given by God and nature? Surely not the right of deposit, for that was given by treaty; and as to the right of navigation, that has been neither suspended nor brought into question. But we are told by the same gentleman, that the possession of New Orleans is necessary to our complete security. Leaving to the gentleman's own conscience to settle the question as to the morality of taking that place, because it would be convenient, he would inform him that the possession of it will not give us complete security. The island of Cuba, from its position, and the excellence of its harbors, commands the Gulf of Mexico as completely as New Orleans does the river Mississippi, and to give that complete security that he requires of the President, the island of Cuba must likewise be taken possession of. It has been shown that the measures proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he would again demonstrate it, if it was necessary, are calculated to bring upon the Western country all the mischiefs that gentleman has depicted as resulting to them from a loss of the navigation of the river Mississippi. If we are driven to war to assert our rights, the Western people must make up their minds to bear that loss during the war; for without a naval superiority, which we have not and cannot obtain, or the possession of Cuba, we shall not be able to avail ourselves of the navigation to any useful purpose. Although we may take possession of the Floridas and New Orleans, it is from a conviction of its pernicious effects upon the Western country, as well as other reasons, that he was averse to appealing to arms as long as there is a prospect of attaining our object in another way. It has been said in this debate, that war cannot take place without the interference of Great Britain, which he presumed is relied upon to give us a naval superiority. This, Mr. President, would be opening to us a new scene. At some period or other we may find ourselves forced to seek alliances with some Power that has a considerable naval force; he could conceive a state of things that would make it prudent; but it certainly is not our interest or policy to precipitate ourselves into a situation that would make that a necessary measure. We have been warned by the experience of other nations, and by the admonitions of our most enlightened citizens, to avoid entangling alliances, to keep ourselves clear of such a connexion with other nations as would probably make us a party to all their wars; and he trusted that when a necessity did exist, if it ever should, there will be found wisdom enough in that department of our Government in whom the power of negotiation is vested to anticipate such a state of things.

It seemed to him that to begin a war upon such an expectation, and to depend upon future negotiation for forming connexions to carry us through it with success, would be a system of policy too weak and childish ever to be pursued by an American Congress. It would be to submit the interest, and perhaps the honor of this country to a nation who would extort from us sacrifices as injurious as a disadvantageous peace would impose. And it must be obvious, that without the most discreet use of the power vested in Congress to make war, and a perfect co-operation between the treaty-making power and the Legislature, we shall subject our country to the greatest difficulties in this way. He would say nothing of the present state of Europe, to show that there may be an indisposition in any nation to go to war, nor of the rival and conflicting interests of any nation with those of the United States. Every gentleman has full information upon these subjects, and will appreciate them as they merit.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, probably distrusting the success of his measures, if they depended exclusively upon the act of the Intendant of New Orleans, has brought into view aggressions committed upon our commerce during the late war, and which that gentleman knows are in a train of adjustment, and could only have been mentioned by him with a view to produce the greatest possible degree of irritation against Spain. Upon this part of his argument he would make some further observations hereafter. As the discussion advanced, new objects and new adversaries were successively developed, until, from the recovery of a commercial privilege, we were gradually led on to the emancipation, and indirectly to be the arbiters of the old and new worlds.

The gentleman from New York, finding the weight of argument against him, and that a resort to arms would not be justifiable upon the ground taken by his friends, with a boldness and promptitude that characterizes veteran politicians, has not only assigned new and different causes for war, but new objects, and a new and more powerful enemy to cope with. He no doubt felt the force of the arguments that have been used to show the improbability that Spain would authorize an act that would produce a rupture with this country, at the moment that she was parting with Louisiana, and when she could not possibly derive any advantage from the wrong that she could do us by that act; and at a time when we know from unquestionable evidence that it is the desire of Spain to cultivate a good understanding with this country. He could give no credit to the suggestion, that the First Consul had required Spain to take that step. He knew that character too well to believe that he would attempt to throw a responsibility upon others, for his measures, nor indeed could it be shown that the First Consul would be in any way benefited by it; he knows the American character too well to believe that any of the reasons that have been assigned by his friends who have preceded him in this argument, would form a justification for a declaration of war, without a previous demand for a redress of the wrongs that we have sustained. He knows that our countrymen, with a courage and perseverance that does promise success in any war, are at all times ready when it is necessary to assert their rights with arms, but that they will not be employed in wars of ambition or conquest; and above all, he sees the folly of going to war with Spain, and taking from her a country that we should be obliged in honor and justice to give up to the French, perhaps the instant after we had taken possession of it; for if France would reinstate us in the rights and privileges that we hold under our new treaty with Spain, I demand of the gentleman from New York, if he would wish this country to hold possession against France; and if he would, upon what ground he would justify it?

The cession was made to France before the injury done us by the Spanish officer; knowing this, we take the country; upon France demanding it of us, we should be bound by every principle of honor and justice to give her possession, upon her engaging to respect properly our rights. Spain, having injured us, surely will not justify our committing an outrage of the most injurious and insulting nature upon France. Would conduct like this comport with the gentleman's ideas of national honor, about which we have heard so much in the course of this debate? Can it be, that an act, which, if perpetrated by an individual, would be robbery, can be justifiable in a nation? And can it be justifiable in the eyes of men, who believe there is nothing so precious or important as national honor? Can the usefulness or convenience of any acquisition justify us in taking from another by force what we have no sort of right to? If these things come within the pale of his (Mr. MORRIS'S) laws of honor, for my country I disclaim all obedience to them! The gentleman (Mr. MORRIS) has said, that the ceding of a country by the possessor to another country, is a good cause for war to a nation in the neighborhood of the country ceded. In this doctrine, he believed, the gentleman would find himself unsupported by any authority, or by the practice of nations; he would, on the contrary, find example constantly against him. Did Great Britain make war on Spain or France when Louisiana was ceded by the latter to the former? No. How is such a war to terminate? Should we be authorized to conquer, and hold it for ourselves? Or must we make war with Spain and France, until we can oblige the former to resume the possession and government of the country? The cession to France cannot give us a right; and to make war for the restoration of the country to Spain, would be a madness unrivalled by anything that has happened since the crusades for the recovery of the Holy Land. In this dilemma, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) abandons the ground taken by his friends, and, instead of joining the gentleman from Pennsylvania in charging the Spanish Government with the blackest and most wanton perfidy towards this country, he speaks of that nation as disposed to do everything that honor and good faith can require of her, but that she is humbled to the lowest state of degradation by the force of a superior Power; in short, what he has said of that country is more likely to excite our commiseration than our vengeance; accordingly, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) disdains a conflict with a nation that has been made the unwilling instrument of doing us wrong.

He puts out of view all the considerations that influenced his friend from Pennsylvania; by the sound of his voice he dispels the whole force that his friend had brought up in martial array against us—throws away the mask—and declares that France, not Spain, is the nation we are to go to war with. He would, as concisely as he could, recapitulate to the House the principal reasons given by the gentleman for going to war with France. The cession of Louisiana is a sufficient cause for war; upon that subject he had said enough to show its absurdity. We are told, and even by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. Ross,) that it is necessary to prevent the French from taking possession of that country, or they will seduce the people in the western parts of these States. This is the most extraordinary argument that ever was used, connected with what was the professed object of the resolutions under consideration. The object of the resolutions was said to be, to secure to those people the free navigation of that river, and a convenient place of deposit for their produce. This measure can alone be justified by a belief that we shall not be permitted to enjoy these important rights. This was at first said, but now it is openly avowed, that there is no fear of that sort; and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MORRIS,) not satisfied with insinuating this, has told us, in plain terms, that France will not only permit the free navigation of the river, and the right of deposit, but that they will give such great and exclusive advantages to the people in our western country, as will put them at the disposal of France; so that it is not to secure to our western brethren their rights that we are to go to war, but to prevent their having an extension of those rights. As a representative of a great number of western people, he felt himself alarmed for their interests, when he connected this with what fell from the gentleman, (Mr. MORRIS,) when speaking of the effects upon the Middle States of a cession of Louisiana to France; he said that France would give such a monopoly of the supply of their own islands, and the Dutch and Spanish islands, to the western people, as would ruin the trade of the Middle States. Is it consistent, with a regard to the western people, or to the union of the States, to attempt to show that the prosperity of one part of the Union, is to cause the ruin of another? Are not these observations calculated to excite the jealousy of the Atlantic States against the Western? Fortunately, however, the gentleman (Mr. MORRIS) has used arguments so contradictory, that it is impossible they should produce an effect anywhere. In another part of his speech he did say, if the French gained possession of Louisiana, that the western people would never obtain the value of their produce—that, in time of peace, there would be no purchasers but French merchants, who had no capital ; and that, in time of war, there would be no price, as their trade would be cut off. Surely that gentleman can entertain very little respect for the Senate, when he ventures to use arguments so contradictory and inconsistent with each other. As to the danger of the western people deserting and betraying their country, the suggestion deserved the severest reprehension.

There were not in America, men more attached or more faithful to the Government of the United States than they were ; and I will venture to predict, from my knowledge of them, that they will be the last to submit to the yoke of despotism, let it be attempted to be imposed upon them by whom it may. If there is one part of America more interested than any other in preserving the union of these States, and the present Government, it is the western. Important as the Mississippi is to them, their free intercourse with the Atlantic States is more important—all their imports are received through that channel, and their most valuable exports are sold, and will continue to be so, in the Atlantic States. The same gentleman (Mr. MORRIS) says, we must line our frontier with custom-house officers, to prevent smuggling. If there is any force in what he says upon this subject, we ought not only to take New Orleans and the Floridas, but Louisiana, and all the British possessions on the continent. Another reason urged with great earnestness by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) is, that France, without this acquisition, is too powerful for the peace and security of the rest of the world—that half the nations that lately existed are gone—that those that are left are afraid to act, and nation after nation falling at her nod—that, if France acquires the Floridas and New Orleans, it will put England and Spain completely in her power, giving to those places an importance that they do not merit ; and yet that gentleman and his friends have repeatedly asserted that war would not result from our taking immediate possession of those places ; indeed, they say, it is the only way to avoid war. At one moment the country is represented as so important as to make the First Consul the sovereign of the world ; at the next, we are told that we may take it without any sort of risk, and without a probability that either France or Spain will go to war with us for the recovery of a country so all-important to them. In the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I say, this idle tale may amuse children, but will not satisfy men.

Mr. President, we have nothing to fear from the colony of any European nation on this continent ; they ought rather to be considered as a pledge of the good conduct of the mother country towards us ; for such possessions must be held only during our pleasure.

Can France, in fifty years, or in a century, establish a colony in any part of the territories now possessed by Spain, that could resist the power of the United States, even at this day, for a single campaign ? What has been our progress since the year 1763, in settling our western country ?

In forty years, under the most favorable circumstances that a new country could be settled, we have only a population of between five and six hundred thousand souls, and this country is settled by men who knew it perfectly—by men who either carried all their friends with them, or who knew that change of residence would not prevent their frequently seeing and hearing from their nearest relatives. Can it be expected that any country will be peopled as fast, from a nation at the distance of three thousand miles, as our western country has been ? And yet we are taught to be apprehensive of a colony to be landed tomorrow or next day from Europe. Sir, if we are wise and true to ourselves, we have nothing to fear from any nation, or combination of nations, against us. We are too far removed from the theatre of European politics, to be embroiled in them, if we act with common discretion. Friendship with us, is the interest of every commercial and manufacturing nation. Our interest is not to encourage partialities or prejudices towards any, but to treat them all with justice and liberality. He should be sorry to reproach any nation—he would rather suffer former causes of reproach to be buried in oblivion ; and he was happy to perceive that prejudices which were incidental to the war that we had been forced into in defence of our liberties, with a nation from which we are principally sprung, were fast wearing off. Those prejudices had been very powerfully revived, soon after our Revolution had established our independence, by the aggressions of that nation, in various ways, more flagrant and atrocious than anything we have to complain of at this day.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania said that this is not an apposite case ; that at that time there was no blockade. It is true there was not a blockade of one of our ports, nor is there now, (the river Mississippi is open for the passage of our boats and vessels,) but we were injured, in a commercial point of view, in a more material manner than we should have been by the blockade of the Delaware or the Chesapeake ; for all the countries (except Great Britain) to which it was desirable for us to trade were declared to be in a state of blockade, and all our vessels going to those countries were subject to seizure. Let gentlemen call to mind what was the conduct of our Government at that time. The House of Representatives had the subject under consideration, when the then President appointed an Envoy Extraordinary to demand satisfaction of Great Britain. What was the conduct of the members of the House of Representatives, who were acting upon the subject, before it was known to them that the Executive had taken any measures to obtain satisfaction for the injury sustained ? Did they attempt to counteract the Executive ? No ; they suspended all Legislative discussions and Legislative measures. And even the injuries done us by the actual invasion of our territory, the erection of fortifications within our limits, the withholding the posts that belonged to us by treaty, and the robbery and abuse of our citizens on the high seas, did not provoke us to declare war, nor even to dispossess the invaders of our territory of what actually belonged to us. The Executive proposed to negotiate, and it was thought improper to obstruct it. How gentlemen, who approved of the interference of the Executive upon that occasion, can justify their attempt to defeat the efforts of the present Administration to obtain redress for the injury that we now complain of, they must answer to their consciences and their country. Fortunately for the United States, not only the President, but a majority of both Houses of Congress, upon the present occasion, have put themselves in the gap between the pestilence and the people.

It has been asked, in a triumphant tone, (and it would seem as if gentlemen believed it could not be answered,) what have you to give for the restoration of those rights on the Mississippi which you seek to recover and secure? For our rights, sir, we disdain to barter; they are not to be the subject of negotiation. The business of our Envoy, I presume, will be to demand their complete restoration, and indemnity for the privation; and if in this he should fail, we have a sure resort in the bravery and patriotism of our countrymen, and the resources of our country. Have the gentlemen to learn at this day that the American people are at all times ready to risk their lives and fortunes to assert their rights, and to preserve their real honor; that they can readily distinguish between the real calls of honor and the factitious appeals that will be so frequently addressed to them to answer particular purposes? For our rights, sir, I answer, we have nothing to give, but that we will risk everything to secure them. As to an extension of our territory, or acquiring commercial advantages that do not of right belong to us, if any nation should be disposed to make us an offer of such, the gentlemen who have asked the question know that we have the means of payment, in several different modes, if we choose to resort to them.

Having answered the question that has been asked of us, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MORRIS) will be so civil as to state to the Senate what we should have to give to the First Consul to induce him to let us hold New Orleans, and to Spain to prevail upon her to permit us to hold the Floridas, after taking these places. Or, does the gentleman believe that the First Consul would be more disposed to accommodate us after our committing, as to him, an unprovoked insult and outrage, than he would if we had given him no just cause of complaint? Does the gentleman believe that the way to conciliate a man whom he has represented as magnanimous in some things, who he describes as having conquered one-half the world, and as contemplating the subjugation of the rest; I say, sir, does the gentleman believe that the way to propitiate such a man is to insult and injure him? If, as the gentleman thinks, it is all-important to this country to obtain the Floridas and New Orleans, there can be no doubt (if the thing is practicable) that we should be more likely to succeed by negotiation, before any act of hostility on our part, than afterwards.

If the gentleman from New York had exerted his ingenuity as much to state the grounds upon which an expectation of the complete success of our Envoy might be founded, he would have been at least as usefully employed for his country as he has been in his attempt to show that it will not succeed, and he would have avoided the palpable contradictions of his own arguments that he has run into. The gentleman himself, without intending it, has assigned sufficient reasons why we might expect entire satisfaction. He has said, truly, that America, united, holds the command of the West Indies in her hands. This must be known to all the nations that have colonies there; it must likewise be known to the proprietors of Louisiana and the Floridas, that, circumstanced as we at present are, there will be perpetual sources of contention between them and us. Everything that has happened as to the Mississippi will be reacted as to the great rivers that head in what is now the Mississippi Territory, and empty themselves into the Gulf of Mexico, after passing through West Florida. In the infancy of the colonies that may be settled in Florida or Louisiana, the mother country can count upon nothing but expense, particularly if they are to be the causes of perpetual quarrels with this country. In twenty years the population of the United States will be nine or ten millions of people; one-third of that population will probably be on the Western waters. This will give a force in that quarter of the Union equal to that with which we contended with Great Britain; and our united force will be such, that no nation at the distance of three thousand miles will be able to contend with us for any object in our neighborhood. These considerations, with a belief that, if we are treated with justice and liberality, we shall never violate the rights of other nations, or suffer ourselves to be involved in the wars that may take place among the great European nations, are arguments that cannot be withstood, if the Governments of France and Spain are in the hands of wise men; for they must see that they have nothing to hope from a contest with us, and that a union of our force with a rival nation would be productive of very serious danger and inconvenience to them.

Much has been said about confidence in the Executive. We have been challenged by the gentlemen on the other side of the House to run the race of confidence with them. His confidence was as great in the present Executive as it could or ought to be; but, much as he respected the Chief Magistrate, and those whom he has associated with himself in the Administration, he could not go to the lengths of confidence to which some gentlemen had suddenly found themselves disposed to proceed. He did not choose to confide the power of making war to the discretion of any man whatever. That power, perhaps the most important of all powers, belonged to Congress, and to them alone. It would be treason against the Constitution to transfer it to other hands. If we have a right to do it for a month or a year, we have a right to do it for twenty years. Shall we have to combat this despotic disposition with gentlemen forever? Is there to be no end to these attempts upon the Constitution, and the weight of the people in public measures? Are we to be reproached, then, for not confiding to the Executive powers that belong to the Legislature? Are we to be reproached because we will not entrust powers in the hands of our friends which we refused to our adversaries? He gloried in such reproach—he considered it as eulogium.

But gentlemen ought not to persuade themselves that this mode of proceeding can impose upon the House or the public an opinion of their sincerity. If gentlemen were really sincere, their conduct would be of a very different character. If they wished to show their confidence in the Executive they would not patronise the calumnies which are daily heaped upon him, in papers which derive their support from their liberality, or that of their friends. They would, if sincere, repress that calumny, or withdraw their countenance from the papers which utter it. They would discountenance those infamous lies, many of which, from having lived in the neighborhood of the President, he was enabled to say were groundless and infamous calumnies. There is another way, sir, in which those gentlemen may manifest their confidence in the President, and which the public good requires of them: it is, that they acquiesce in the effort that he is making to obtain our rights, and security for those rights, by negotiation, and thereby add to its chance of success. In this way their confidence could have been shown in a manner useful to our country; and it may not yet be too late. We have been told of other acts of hostility on the part of Spain, prior to the restriction of our right of deposit. This was evidently intended to irritate the public mind, but his friend from New York (Mr. CLINTON) had very properly and justly repelled that artifice; he had shown that this was a separate and distinct subject; that it had nothing to do with the New Orleans transactions. Though not at liberty to declare the source of his information, yet he would assert that Spain has given indisputable evidence of a sincere disposition to do us justice for the injuries we sustained in our commerce during the late war. From the course of this discussion, it is evident that it was intended, not to enforce conviction on the minds of this House, but to produce an effect out of doors. It was therefore important that no erroneous statement of an important fact should go abroad uncontradicted. A member from Delaware (Mr. WELLS) had said that our Government had received information from the Governor of New Orleans that the right of deposit had been taken away, in consequence of orders from the competent authority—meaning the Government of France or Spain. [Mr. WELLS rose to explain.] The gentleman says he was not understood by me. A proof that I did so understand him, is, I made inquiries that enabled me to contradict, in the most positive manner, the information that I thought that gentleman had given to the Senate.

Mr. DAYTON said, he lamented exceedingly the indisposition of the honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) not only because it had compelled him to abridge his arguments, which always entertained, even when they failed to convince, but because to that distraction of mind which sickness often produces, could alone be ascribed the doubts expressed by that member, respecting the views of the advocates of the original resolutions. The difficulty of the opposers of the resolutions, would, he said, have been less, if the gentlemen who supported them had settled among themselves what was their object, and had ascertained with whom we were to make war. To both these points, Mr. D. said, the fullest and clearest answers had been given. Our object, says he, is to obtain a prompt redress of injuries immediately affecting our western brethren, who look to us for decisive and effectual measures, and have told us that a delay of remedy will be ruinous to them; and our views and wishes are to take possession of the place of deposit guarantied by treaty, whether it be in the hands of the one nation or the other, and to hold it as a security that the trade of so important a river should not be liable to similar interruptions in future. We are not, as the gentleman from Virginia would insinuate, for rushing into a war, but we are for repelling insults, and insisting upon our rights, even at the risk of one. It was easy to foresee that the opposers of the resolutions offered by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, must resort to other means than fair argument, to justify them in the course which they were about to pursue. Our most precious rights flagrantly violated, treaties perfidiously broken, the outlet or road to market of half a million of our fellow-citizens obstructed, our trade shackled, our country grossly insulted, were facts too notorious, and too outrageous to allow them the least plausible ground of reasoning. Deprived of every other means of attack, they have resorted to that of alarm. They charge us with a thirst for war, and enter into a description of its horrors, as if they supposed that it was in our power to produce, or in theirs to prevent it. That which requires the concurrence of two parties, viz: contract or negotiation, they consider most easy; and war, which may always be produced by one party only, they consider as most difficult. Nay, sir, they do what is more extraordinary and unpardonable, they shut their eyes to the fact that hostility has already been commenced against us. Attacked and insulted as we had been, do we now, asked Mr. D., call for war? Let the resolutions give the answer. They begin with a declaration of certain rights, indisputable in their nature, indispensable in their possession, to the safety, peace, and union of this country. Not a member opposed to us has controverted them, except the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT.) He denied the truth of all except one of them, and even of a part of that one. His honorable friends from the western country, who are in the habit of acting with him, cannot thank him for such defence. The formerly well applied words, "Non tali auxilio nec defensoribus istis egent," must be applicable on this occasion, and it may be as well to leave them with each other to settle the question of their rights. But there is one article of the Maryland member's creed which ought not to escape comment, because, if adopted, it would be fatal to the Union. I understood him, said Mr. D., as stating that inasmuch as the produce which descends the Mississippi bears a proportion of about a twentieth only to the exports of the whole Union, it was not reasonable to expect that the other portion should be endangered to protect that minor part. If maxims like this were to actuate our councils, short indeed would be the duration of our independence. Our enemies would have only to attack us by piecemeal, State by State, to make us an easy prey. The honorable member from Maryland could not hope for even that gloomy consolation which we heard of on a former melancholy occasion. He could not flatter himself that he and his State would be left to be the last victim.

But, Mr. President, every other gentleman appears to admit the truth of the prefatory declaration of rights; they admit, too, that if we cannot be possessed of them otherwise, we must seize on them by force; but they refuse to give the means and the power to the President, in whom they have told us, over and over again, they repose implicit confidence. Is any one of the resolutions too imperative on the President, we will agree so to alter as to make it discretionary, if desired by any gentleman on the other side; for without their leave, we cannot now amend our own resolutions.

It is my consolation, Mr. President, said Mr. D., and it ought to be matter of triumph to my honorable friend, the mover of these resolutions, that, whatever may be their fate, the introduction and discussion of them will have produced no little benefit. They have brought forward gentlemen to pledge themselves, in their speeches, to employ force on failure of negotiation; which, though late, is better than never. They must be allowed the merit, too, of producing the resolutions which they offer as a substitute. These milk-and-water propositions of Mr. BRECKENRIDGE will at least serve to show that something should be done, some preparation made; and therefore even to these, feeble as they are, I will agree, if more cannot be carried. But let the relative merits of the two be compared. Ours authorize to call out of those militia nearest to the scene, and most interested in the event, a number not exceeding fifty thousand, and to give them orders to act, when the occasion requires it, in conjunction with the army and navy; theirs authorize an enrolment of eighty thousand, dispersed over the whole Continent, without any authority to act with them, however pressing the danger, nor even to march them out of their own State. Ours authorize the President to take immediate possession of some convenient place of deposit, as guaranteed by treaty, in order to afford immediate vent for the Western produce, and relief to our suffering fellow-citizens, and thereby put it out of the power of a Spanish Intendant, whether acting from caprice, or orders from his Court, to obstruct so important an outlet; theirs give no such authority, but leave to the slow progress and uncertainty of negotiation that remedy, which, to delay, is almost as fatal as to refuse.

Mr. WRIGHT had not intended again to have spoken in the present debate, but had been constrained to it by the misrepresentation of the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. DAYTON,) who had ventured to declare, that "he had said that the commerce of the Mississippi was too insignificant for us to risk a war in its defence." Was it possible that gentleman could have misconceived what he had said on that subject? He presumed not; his observations had been so far from equivocal, that they had been pointed, "that the right of deposit was all important, and ought to be secured at all hazard." He feared there was a design to misrepresent; but that fact, the House for themselves would decide.

It was well known that he had strenuously advocated the rights of foreign nations, secured to them by the law of nations, and by their existing treaties; that he had reprobated, as disgraceful, their violation; that he had endeavored to stamp the infamous practice with merited obloquy, and to drag to condign punishment their infractors; and should it be said that he had a design to sacrifice the best interest of the Western people, (a member of our Government,) secured to them by the Constitution he had sworn to support; and that only because he had preferred the pacific measures that had been adopted, to a war! He feared the gentleman had been governed by the unworthy spirit of recrimination, because he had detected his misstatement of the amount of exports from the Mississippi; and had, by the production of the official documents on that subject, corrected his misrepresentations, which he considered to be his duty to correct, so that the House might not act on false premises; and in this opinion he was in some measure confirmed, by the gentleman's extraordinary attack yesterday on the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLINTON,) for his firm opposition to the gentleman's war measures; when, with great acrimony, he asked, where was that gentleman (Mr. CLINTON) in 1776, when he was fighting the battles of his country? "He was," said he, "in the egg-shell, or in his mother's lap." Was it a ground of reproof that a gentleman was not born before his time? No; it was a perfect excuse; he could not, in that state, be expected to take a part in the glorious contest: but, I ask, where was his father? Did he not hold a conspicuous rank in the armies of America? or have we forgotten that General Clinton was one of the saviours of his country; and have we not full proof that the son inherits his father's virtues? He, for his own part, had more than once unsheathed his sword in support of American independence; but he thought that the gentleman from New Jersey and himself, would both make a good bargain, could they exchange their revolutionary laurels with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CLINTON,) for his bloom of youth, and the fifteen or twenty years' advantage he had, by being an infant at the commencement of the American war. How different was the treatment that the gentleman from New York and himself had experienced, from what had been practised towards others during that debate! Yesterday, the honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) made Bonaparte the King of Kings; and the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. COCKE) gave the gentleman from New Jersey, and his friends, a rank among the gods. I wish he had prevailed on that gentleman, while exercising his godlike attributes, like Jupiter of old, to have rained gold into our Treasury, and not by endeavoring to foment unnecessary war, to drain it of its treasure. This would have given him a rank among patriots, greatly to be preferred to his rank among the gods.

Mr. OLcott declared, that though he should vote for the original resolutions, he was as firmly and decidedly opposed to war as any gentleman in that House. He should have remained silent, had it not been so frequently asserted that war was the object of those who supported the original resolutions; and he rose to contradict that assertion, lest, by his silence, it might be supposed he acquiesced in the charge of a desire for war—against which he protested.

Mr. J. JACKSON, of Georgia, was surprised to hear gentlemen still contend that war is not implicated in the resolutions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Although he was well aware that, after so full a discussion, little could be said that was important, yet he hoped to be indulged in a very few observations, and he should be short in making them.

The best mode of examining the conduct of one nation towards another, where an injury has taken place, and satisfaction is required, is to resort to private life; for nations are sometimes neighbors, as well as persons. The arguments of gentlemen, and the tenor of the resolutions, lead to taking possession of the island of New Orleans prior to negotiations, or peaceable steps to obtain redress. Nations are bound by moral ties, and those of justice, as well as individuals; let us take a case then from private life. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. OLcott) and himself both lay claim to a house; the servants of that gentleman possess it: instead of seeking legal and proper means to establish the right claim, he enters the house, beats out that gentleman's servants, takes possession of his furniture, and then tells him, "I am ready to come to an amicable settlement," or leaves him to seek legal redress! Would justice, would moral obligation permit this? Would our laws permit it? No, sir; the law would turn the aggressor out, and place the original and right possessor in his former state, and then leave them to their proper course of redress. Should we not stand, in taking possession of New Orleans, in the eyes of the world, precisely in the situation of the aggressor in private life? We should, sir, and as perfectly unjustifiable. We should rouse the jealousy of Europe, and involve ourselves, in all probability, in a war, the evils of which, or its extent, cannot be calculated. What, sir, was the consequence of the King of Prussia's taking possession of Silesia under a dormant claim, in the seven years war, without negotiation? It involved

Austria, Russia, France, England, and almost all the other nations of Europe in a bloody and expensive contest, from the evils of which some of those Powers have never extricated themselves—it loaded and fettered them with debt; and if we take the step proposed, we may, by rousing the jealousy of Europe, produce the same effect and the same consequences on ourselves.

An honorable gentleman near me, (Mr. MORRIS,) was pleased to say, he was surprised to hear the anecdote quoted from Count D'Estaing, that national honor was national interest. Yet, sir, after all the observations of the gentleman, he has admitted it, and contradicted himself. For he, after painting Bonaparte in a variety of horrible shapes, as well as the nation he presides over, has declared the nation a noble one, whose interest is Bonaparte's honor, and his honor their glory. It makes no difference, sir, what this interest consists of. Bonaparte's glory weighs as interestedly with him as any other object possibly could, and the gentleman has said his glory must shine—he must conquer, or he is lost; is this, then, not his interest, and a most powerful interest? A corroboration of the assertion in the anecdote, that national honor is national interest, has been fully admitted and proved, by another gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. WELLS)—he has expressly declared that the nations of Europe are only so long bound by treaty as they find it their interest!

What then, sir, is our interest? Is it to go to war? To copy the old systems of Europe; to involve ourselves in broils; to fetter our country with debt; to mortgage our posterity, and their funds? Take a view of England, and the consequence of her continued wars; a national debt of between five and six hundred millions, which she can never shake off but by the same means her neighbor, France, has adopted; a total downfall to the existing Government; a revolution of principles; and, perhaps, in the general wreck, the rise of a usurper. The time was, when he felt himself the zealous advocate of the French Revolution, and the noble sentiments of that nation; but that day had passed. He much doubted the benefit France will ever receive from her Revolution; and much more, any advantage the nations of the earth will derive from it. That nation, sir, worked itself up, or was worked up, by the attempts of other nations, to divide her territory and enslave her, to such a pitch, as to overleap the mark, and plunged the people into a situation much worse, in his opinion, than under the guidance of the Bourbons. Shall we proceed in this way; involve ourselves in debt, and make it necessary to upset our Government and Constitution, to get rid of it? He hoped and trusted not. We have the happiest—the best—would he be permitted to say, the only Constitution that secures national liberty, on earth! France has, it is true, what is called, a written constitution; but, sir, is it binding? It is changing daily; and we may venture to affirm, that the will of Bonaparte is the constitution of France. He did not wish to cast reflections on this or that nation, or this or that character. Every nation has a right to seek its own happiness in her government, as she pleases; but he hoped we should not copy them in their vices. He believed that no democratic Republic but our own exists, or can exist; and no other form of government than ours can secure such a Republic. We have guards and securities, which no other Government possesses, or ever possessed. Our General and State governments are checks on, and balance each other, and render innovation on our constitutions and happy form of government, very difficult; and, under them, durable influence, usurpation, or tyranny, are impossible. Let us beware, then, how we take any steps which may tend to impair our Constitution, and thereby destroy our rights. We are now the happiest people on earth, and, if united, the force of Europe cannot injure us.

He must be permitted here to declare, that he understood the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. WHITE) as his friend from Tennessee, (Mr. ANDERSON) did, in his argument of that morning, as asserting that in case France got New Orleans, the Southern and Western people would be influenced by them. He was justified in noticing this circumstance, if not by the observations of the gentleman from Delaware, by those which fell from the gentleman on his left, (Mr. MORRIS.) He has positively asserted, that if the French gained the Floridas, the affections of the Georgians towards the United States would be weakened; that they would be influenced by the French principles, and that it would be found dictating the speeches on this floor. He spurned such an unworthy idea from him. His countrymen have too much attachment to this happy Government; they know that their independence, their rights, their properties, depend on it—depend on union with their sister States, and no consideration on earth would induce them to attach themselves to any other Power. The idea is absurd, therefore, that any gentleman representing Georgia will ever show, by his speeches on this floor, any French or other foreign influence.

His friend from Tennessee had spoken the truth respecting the western inhabitants. Those suspicions ought not to prevail; it is not politic, nor are they grounded. He could venture to go farther; he believed that the Western States, at this day, contain more of the soldiers of the Revolution, than all the Atlantic States together—they are peopled by them, and their descendants; they cannot be torn from the Union—they will not be colonized by any nation on earth; they are the same men, now, they were during the Revolution; notwithstanding, after bearing the toils of the day of trial, and losing their all, they were compelled to quit their native States, and seek new lands beyond the mountains. Sir, they are attached to your happy Constitution; they fought to obtain your independence; they are of the same habits, the same manners, they have the same love of liberty with their fellow-citizens in the Atlantic States; and never will, unless driven from you, desert you.

What inducement have they to join any other nation? Will they fling themselves into the arms of France, in the state in which the nation now is, as he had before observed, with no other constitution, no other security, than the will of a Bonaparte for their liberties, and leave their own happy constitutions and independence? No. Will they join what the gentleman from Delaware has termed the sluggish, inanimate Spaniard, and the slave of France—a nation, I acknowledge, however revered in the fifteenth century, in the reign of Charles V., now governed by superstition and bigotry, without a solitary spark of liberty within herself, and trammelled by another nation without? They will not. Will they return to Britain, which, to do her justice, is the only nation of the Old World where there is a vestige of freedom, even in appearance, remaining; but where, from her situation, loaded and fettered with debt, her posterity disposed of at market, and their rights and future revenues mortgaged—security of property or rights hang on the brink of revolution, and which must not long hence take place, as it already has in France, if the debt is not wiped off, at the risk of everything—every article, every necessary of life almost, being already taxed to carry on her Government, and on trying occasions, added to this, an income tax of ten per cent. on the whole profits of their estates? Will the people of Georgia, or the West, go to her, sir, in this predicament, and leave their own happy Government, with, in comparison, little or no public debt, and that daily paying off; without those odious taxes—the whole being not much above seventy millions of dollars, whilst that of Britain is between five and six hundreds of millions of pounds sterling, and which, at the best, their colonies must sooner or later pay part of? They will not go there, sir, they know the value of their own happy situation too well. Where then, will they go? To any of the other nations of Europe? No; they are incapable of protecting them. Russia is the only Power which could make a show of protection; and are our Western citizens prepared for the knout, or the wilds of Siberia? Sir, those fears are imaginary, they are groundless, they ought not to exist—the idea ought not to be started, the thing ought not to be mentioned. The citizens either of Georgia or the Western States, cannot be torn from the Union by the exertions, the intrigues, or the force of any power in existence.

But while we are told so much of Genet, and his insidious practices in our Southern States, at this great distance from the Executive, has no other Power attempted to intrigue and draw the affections of your citizens from you, but France? Yes, sir, if masters are to be accountable for their servants, Britain has. He was, himself, notwithstanding all his predilection for the French nation, and the French Revolution—which he now almost regretted, for it has injured the cause they embarked in—he said, he was himself impressed with the impropriety of Mr. Genet's conduct, justified as it was by the precedent of our own Ambassadors, during the Revolutionary war, stirring up the people of Holland, and intriguing with all the Governments of Europe, to induce a confederacy against Britain. This, sir, was thought right and justifiable by us, at that day; and we have therefore no right to censure the French Ambassador, for following our steps; and no doubt he, and his nation, deemed his proceedings as proper, as we thought ours.

Yes, sir, Britain did the same. Mr. Liston was concerned with Chisholm and others, in stirring up the South and Southwestern citizens in the same manner. He alluded to Blount's conspiracy. A British frigate entered the ports of Georgia; her commander had his pocket full of commissions—they were offered to citizens of that State, now alive to testify it. The object, sir, was to make a stroke at Spain, and through her, the United States; there was an intimate connexion between that plan and the recent speculation,* which, thank God, has happily failed; the territory, the object of that speculation, was to have been seized at that moment, and the United States involved in war; it was happily evaded. But how the leaders, Blount and others, escaped punishment, is best known to the Senate of the United States at that time in existence; no doubt satisfactory reasons appeared to them, which might not be deemed so by the citizens at large, who had no opportunity of judging correctly of them. As to the persons concerned in that speculation, it is but justice to say, some Republicans were among them, but the majority, and a large one, were Federalists. Why then are we told so much of Genet's intrigues, and nothing of Mr. Liston's? Their plans were the same; neither of them succeeded; and it is not in the power of the world to corrupt the citizens of the States for whom so much apprehension is expressed.

He must advance that the resolutions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania have in them the seeds of war, which it is our interest to avoid. Justice ought to mark our steps, as well to ourselves as to foreign nations. We have, he agreed with the gentlemen on the other side, a right to call for justice; we have been injured. He insisted again, that Spain had no power to withdraw the right of deposit at New Orleans. She was as much bound to perform her part of the compact in the treaty between us as a nation, as an individual is in private life to perform his. Nations ought to be influenced by the same moral ties; for although he admitted that national honor in many shapes consists in national interest, he did not carry his ideas so far as the gentleman from Delaware, as to say, that treaties ought only to be binding so long as our interest led us to support them; this would destroy all faith among the nations of the earth. Let us first negotiate; the people will be unanimous with us; they will be pleased to see us try every peaceable method before a resort to arms; we shall be justified to the world, and avoid the jealousies of Europe. Having tried this without effect, if we shall be forced to war, whenever this shall happen, let the nation be which it may, we shall be actuated by one heart, one soul, one arm; and, he repeated it, that nation will find the American people will draw the sword and fling away the scabbard, until their rights are restored to them and redress is given for their wrongs.

The gentleman near him (Mr. DAYTON) had triumphantly claimed the merits of both the resolutions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and those of his friend from Kentucky, (Mr. BRECKENRIDGE,) as belonging to his side of the House—the latter having been produced, as he says, in consequence of the former, without which they would not have been thought of; and he has told us that he and his friends will vote for our resolutions, if they cannot carry their own. He was not anxious as to which quarter of the House the merit of the resolutions shall be attached. He had no objection to the gentleman and his friends taking all the merit, provided they will do as he says, vote for those produced by his friend from Kentucky, if they lose their own. Unanimity is all we want; and unanimity, he flattered himself, nay, was certain, from what has fallen from the gentleman, will take place on this occasion. This, sir, has been an auspicious discussion—it ought to be marked in the annals of united America—it ought to be handed down to posterity, that the Senate of the United States, with the same views, but different means of obtaining them, having received an injury from a neighboring nation, unanimously determined to try every peaceable method to obtain satisfaction, and in case of failure of negotiation for redress, to be prepared to assert the rights of the nation, and to resort to the last argument of politics, the ultima ratio. Our bond of union has been styled by the politicians of Europe, a rope of sand; let them continue to deceive themselves—when such unanimity prevails, the deception is harmless. Our form of government and individual ties prove the deception; and we never ought to lose sight of an old Revolutionary motto, on our rattlesnake money, "UNITED WE STAND, DIVIDED WE FALL." We ought not only to be impressed with the truth of this ourselves, but we should imprint it on the minds of our youth, and thus hand it down to posterity. My life for the event, as long as this impression is made, and this unanimity as to foreign aggression prevails, there is no nation, no power, no tyrant, no despot, on earth, who will dare to violate your rights with impunity.

Mr. CLINTON.—I should not presume at this late hour to trespass upon the exhausted patience of the Senate, were it not that a serious difference as to fact exists between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself—I call it serious, because it involves character—and I beg that what I now say may be distinctly remembered, on some future day, when time shall enable all who hear me to determine between us. In introducing the resolutions, the gentleman expressly stated that Spain had refused to redress her spoliations on our commerce. Astonished at the hardihood of the assertion, I took the words down as they came from his lips. I thought it my duty to contradict them in the most pointed terms. Yesterday the gentleman came forward in another shape, and said that Spain has made no provision for the injuries sustained by our merchants, and that there is no reason to believe that provision in any respect adequate will be made. In this change of the terms of his former allegation, my colleague, in a mode quite variant from his general politeness, has backed him with the authority of his name. My much respected friend from Virginia (Mr. NICHOLAS) has this day stated the essential circumstances of the affair, with perfect accuracy, and in conformity to my representation; and in opposition to the assertions and insinuations of the members from Pennsylvania and New York, I again declare that Spain has not refused to redress the spoliation committed on our commerce; that, for those committed by her own subjects, she is now willing to give us the most ample satisfaction; and that we have every reason to believe, that cases of a different description will receive a friendly and equitable adjustment. With regard to outrages said to have been committed upon the persons of our citizens, I stated that no official information was laid before us; that we could not act in the case without having the facts, which were to serve as a ground of action, authenticated; and that many of our citizens had justly exposed themselves to punishment, by pursuing an illicit trade. The gentleman has now brought forward a protest, taken before the American Consul at Havana. If my memory does not deceive me, this case was a subject of considerable discussion last Summer in the newspapers of Philadelphia and New York. Mr. Duplex, the captain of the vessel, sailed, I believe, from the port of New York, and was charged with being engaged in unlawful commerce. Whether this charge is true, whether this is the same case, and whether the outrages alleged were really committed, I cannot undertake to decide; but I would advise the gentleman, instead of keeping this document any longer in his desk, to send it to the Executive. An inquiry will be immediately instituted; and if our citizens have been really injured, Spain will make, and must make redress.

Since I am up, I will answer some of the principal arguments brought forward by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This gentleman has certainly exhibited his cause in the strongest and fairest light of which it is susceptible. In paying him more than ordinary attention, I render him a tribute due to his ability; but in making this assertion, I do not mean to depreciate the acknowledged talents of the other gentlemen who have spoken on the same side. The gentleman has honored me with peculiar notice, and has selected my observations as the objects of his most formidable attacks. I feel it, therefore, a duty due to civility, to return the compliment; and I also esteem it a duty due to myself, to repel some observations which he has endeavored to fasten upon me, and to defend those which I really brought forward, and which I still think have not been materially impaired by anything said in opposition, during the course of this debate.

The case put by the honorable gentleman, of an invading enemy, shows that he has artfully confounded two things together, which are radically distinct—I mean an offensive and defensive war.

All the observations which go to prove the necessity of previous negotiation, apply only to offensive war. The paramount law of self-preservation, demands that we should resist and repel an invading enemy. It is not necessary to pursue this remark any farther. A little attention to the distinction will show that the honorable gentleman has not been able to weaken my argument in the least. While he has thus confounded distinct subjects together, he has the merit of another invention, which he has actively used to help himself and his friends out of a labyrinth of contradiction—I allude to his application of a distinction between major and minor rights. It is to be wished that he had been more explicit on this subject; and had defined, with precision, what he meant by major rights. Are they rights essential to the existence of a nation; or do they extend further, and include those cases which relate to its prosperity? If to the latter, are not national honor, free commerce, and unviolated territory, essential ingredients of national prosperity? and have they not all been grossly trampled upon under former Administrations, without an immediate resort to force? To prove this distinction of any importance, applied in either shape, it ought to be established, that a privation of the right of deposit, for nine months, if until the result of negotiation can be known, will destroy our national existence, or essentially affect our national prosperity. I admit that a continued privation may have this effect, and am therefore willing, if it cannot be restored by negotiation, to re-establish it by the sword. If there are any rights which can, with propriety, be denominated major, I should suppose that rights of territory, rights of embassy, and rights of commerce, will come under this description; and they have all been violated, again and again, in the proud times, as they are called, of WASHINGTON and ADAMS. The whole Atlantic, as has been justly observed by my friend from Virginia, (General MASON,) has been blocked up against us. To issue from one of our ports or rivers, was almost certain capture. It was not a case affecting the Hudson, the Delaware, the Chesapeake, the Potomac, the Mississippi, or any one of the great outlets; but it applies to them all, and to the ocean, with which they communicated. Negotiation was then the order of the day.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania differs from me respecting the conduct of the Romans, in going to war. I shall leave this question to be determined by those who have turned their attention to the historical inquiries; and will only add, that to their religious attention to previous negotiation, has been attributed, in no inconsiderable degree, the greatness at which they arrived. Every Roman who fought, knew that he was fighting for an injured country; and he fought accordingly. The gentleman has not attempted to attack, directly, the forcible examples I produced from English history, but has endeavored, indirectly, to impair their weight, by indicating cases wherein Great Britain had immediate recourse to violence. The instances which he has adduced, prove only that injustice and robbery have sometimes the sanction of Governments. The case of the French vessels in 1756, which were carrying on innocent commerce under the faith of treaties, and under the protection of the law of nations, and which were seized without any declaration of war, was an act of highway robbery, that would have condemned a private individual to infamy or a gibbet, and that will fix a blot on the character of Lord Chatham, which no time can wash away. The French, in their negotiations for peace, made a compensation for those vessels for a long time a sine qua non, and the refusal of Great Britain certainly protracted the war. The fortune of arms finally compelled France to give way; but this has not altered the character of the transaction. The voice of impartial posterity will class it among the depredations of brigands and pirates.

The gentleman has endeavored to extenuate the enormities of Great Britain, by a representation of the conduct of the French Minister in this country, and the general sensibility excited in favor of the French Revolution. With the conduct of any foreign Minister here, Great Britain had nothing to do, unless that conduct was hostile to her interests, and sanctioned by our Government. The sensibility in favor of France, at the commencement of the Revolution, was not peculiar to this country—it existed in every enlightened part of the world, and flourished luxuriantly in England. It is true that the events of the Revolution were sanguinary and disgraceful; but its principles, being in favor of the establishment of a free government, were calculated to gain respect and approbation. With regard to the French Minister, (Genet,) his conduct was doubtless disagreeable to the President, and his recall was solicited. Our Minister in France (Mr. G. MORRIS) was equally disagreeable to the constituted authorities of that country, and his recall was also solicited. The former was charged with associating with democrats and disorganisers; the other with royalists and aristocrats. The one was said to aim at the overthrow of our Administration; the other was charged with opposing the principles of the Revolution. The one was blamed for visiting the halls of democratic societies; the other for loitering in the regal chambers of the Tuilleries. The one was inculpated as the minister and agent of anarchy and confusion; the other as the patron and advocate of monarchy and privileged orders. A composition was made, and it was agreed that both should be withdrawn. But what effect could this possibly have on the temper, or policy, or interest of the British Court? The Minister at Paris was perhaps as beneficial to their cause, as the Minister at Philadelphia was injurious; and certainly they gained nothing by the nominal recall. The tone of Great Britain to this country was lowered, not by incidents of this kind, but by the events of Europe; by the total frustration of the projects of the crowned heads, leagued together to destroy the sovereignty of the people; and Jay's treaty, bad and disgraceful as it was, would never have been agreed to, or rather no treaty would have been made, with this country, had it not been for the defeat of the Duke of York, before

Dunkirk, and the subsequent disasters which befel the British arms. The gentleman indeed went out of his way, to tell us that a man of high talents was sent to Great Britain to negotiate; that a treaty was formed; that it was opposed with great virulence, but finally adopted; and the gentleman continued to go out of his way, and to inform us, that the negotiator was elected Governor of New York, where he presided for a long time with great honor and advantage, and left behind him an example worthy of imitation! I shall not, sir, speak of the negotiator, or of his negotiations, in the terms I would do if he were present to defend himself; but since I am compelled in vindication of the State I represent, to say something, I may surely be permitted to observe, that the British Treaty was neither honorable nor advantageous to this country; that the negotiator was ignorant of the growth of cotton in the United States, which is one of our most valuable exports; that the list of contraband articles was most improperly extended; that it was put in the power of Great Britain to say when provisions should be deemed contraband; that the great and important principle to neutral commerce, free ships and free goods, was abandoned; and, generally, that reciprocity was in a great measure overlooked. Notwithstanding it was deemed good policy to ratify this pernicious instrument, it was not done without expunging one of its most degrading provisions. The councils of the country hesitated for a long time. Although time has purged the visual ray of the gentleman, (Mr. Ross,) and discovered to him great beauties, in the treaty, yet at that period, I recollect, for he was then first bursting into general notice, it was supposed that he was unfriendly to it; and that expediency alone exacted his assent. We know that General WASHINGTON was prevailed upon by the circumstances of the times, to sign it, and that he elected it only as a lesser evil than war. The negotiator was indeed elected Governor of New York, but it was before the contents of the treaty were promulgated—if they had been known, his chance of success would have been forlorn; at the subsequent election he was withdrawn! The odium attached to his conduct as a negotiator, had been softened down by time, and it was in the year 1798, during the memorable Reign of Terror, when the minds of men were worked up to a state of frenzy, and reason was ejected from her throne. My excellent friend Chancellor Livingston, as much superior to him as Hyperion to a Satyr, was the candidate on the Republican side. On the brink of our election the gossiping report of the famous triple ambassadors, who held conferences, not with the regular authorities of the country to which they were sent, but with the valets and understrappers of Talleyrand, reached this country. The wonderful discoveries they made were magnified by the political necromancy which at that time deluded the public mind; and it was industriously reported at our polls, that treasonable correspondence had been detected; that the leading characters of the opposition were engaged in an attempt to yield up this country to the domination of France; that their own letters were sent over to the United States, and that Mr. Livingston was amongst the most conspicuous of these traitors! Judge of the effects which these hell-born calumnies were likely to have on a people jealous of their country's honor! Mr. Jay prevailed in his election; but when the intelligence and patriotism of the State were permitted to have a free and fair operation, his incompetency became notorious; he was found unqualified to hold the reins of State; the men of observation of his own party knew it, and lamented it; and he fell like Lucifer, never to rise again. He declined another election, because he had sagacity to perceive the working of the waters; he wisely retired from the contest, and avoided the fate which candidates of greater temerity in some of the neighboring States justly experienced.

In order to show that the Spanish aggressions were different from the present, and that our Government pursued a different course, the gentleman has told us, that the treaty had not been executed, and that the Government had directed a body of troops to fall down the Mississippi. I know that Lieutenant Pope went down to the Natchez, with a detachment, certainly not large enough to take possession of that place, and to guard our Commissioner, Mr. Elliot, in running the boundary line; but he certainly never went out of our territory, nor was he ever directed to strike at New Orleans. The obligations of the treaty demanded and enforced its execution as strongly as they required the observance of all its provisions after it had been carried into operation. The breach of faith is the same—the injury the same—the dishonor the same. Two years and upwards, by the gentleman's own admission, we were deprived of the right of deposit, in contravention of the treaty; and what did our Government then do? Did the honorable gentleman carry fire and sword into the territories of Spain? Did they then cry havoc, and let loose the dogs of war? No, no; they sent Lieutenant Pope, and a lieutenant's command, down the Mississippi, with their swords sheathed, and their bayonets unfixed; all was then modest stillness and humility; the blast of war was not blown in our ears, nor did they stiffen the sinews, and summon up the blood.

Nor will it form any solid excuse for the then Administration, as it respects France, to say with the honorable gentleman, that no essential right was invaded by that nation. Are not the rights of commerce and the rights of embassy, essential rights? and were they not vitally attacked and wounded? And if there was a strong party at that time opposed to war with France, there is a vast majority of the American people opposed to a rupture with Spain now. The Administration, indeed, evinced at last some disposition to retaliate the injuries which were heaped upon us; but they acted "as if willing to wound and yet afraid to strike." In the midst of their feeble attacks, warlike preparations, and vaunting rhodomontade, "the rock on which the storm might beat," gave way; a new triple embassy was sent, and the consequences are known to all who hear me. Away then with your empty declamation—with your hyperbolic rant about national honor and national rights! You then drank the cup of humiliation to its very dregs. You then suffered real wounds upon the honor of the country; and you bore it patiently. When you were smitten on one cheek you turned the other—and now, when a subordinate officer, distant from his country three thousand miles, and probably acting from his own impulse, interdicts a right to be enjoyed without our territories, you come forward and give us lectures upon national honor, and vaunt about taking up arms!

I now turn to my honorable colleague, and cannot refrain from congratulating my country for giving birth to so sublime an intellect. Scorning the restraint of common rules, he has started from them with brave disorder, and giving the wing to a lofty fancy, has ascended into the regions of conjecture, far beyond the ken of human observation. He tells us all the world is under the dominion or the fear of Bonaparte; that the States of Russia, Austria, Prussia, and Great Britain are the only ones which have not entirely lost an independent character; but that even they have retired from the contest worsted and faint-hearted; that the First Consul is conducted to the gratification of an insatiable ambition by a more than common capacity; that Louisiana will enable him to establish that ascendancy in the Western, which he has already acquired in the Eastern hemisphere; and that unless the United States imitate the conduct ascribed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to WASHINGTON, and place themselves between the nations of the earth and the destroyer, as he is said to have placed himself between the people and the pestilence, the balance of the great communities of mankind will be deranged, and the world will be enthralled in the vortex of an all-devouring, all-destroying despotism.

Sublime, sir, as these speculations may appear to the eyes of some, and high-sounding as they may strike the ears of many, they do not affect me with any force. In the first place, I do not perceive how they bear upon the question before us; it merely refers to the seizure of New Orleans, not to the maintenance of the balance of power. Again: Of all characters, I think, that of a conquering nation least becomes the American people. What, sir, shall America go forth like another Don Quixotte to relieve distressed nations, and to rescue from the fangs of tyranny the powerful States of Britain, Spain, Austria, Italy, the Netherlands? Shall she, like another Phaeton, madly ascend the chariot of empire and spread desolation and horror over the world? Shall she attempt to restrain the career of a nation which my honorable colleague represents to have been irresistible, and which he declares has appalled the British lion and the imperial eagle of the house of Austria? Shall she wantonly court destruction, and violate all the maxims of policy which ought to govern an infant and free Republic? Let us, sir, never carry our arms into the territories of other nations, unless we are compelled to take them up in self-defence. A pacific character is of all others most important for us to establish and maintain. With a seacoast of two thousand miles, indented with harbors, and lined with cities, with an extended commerce, and with a population of six millions only, how are we to set up for the avengers of nations? Can gravity itself restrain from laughter at the figure which my honorable colleague would wish us to make on the theatre of the world? He would put a fool's cap on our head and dress us up in the parti-colored robes of a harlequin, for the nations of the earth to laugh at; and after all the puissant knights of the times have been worsted in the tournament, by the Orlando Furioso of France, we must then, forsooth, come forward and console them for their defeat by an exhibition of our follies. I look, sir, upon all the dangers we have heard about the French possessions of Louisiana, as visionary and idle. Twenty years must roll over our heads before France can establish in that country a population of two hundred thousand souls. What in the mean time will become of your Southern and Western States? Are they not advancing to greatness with a giant's stride? The western waters will then contain on their borders millions of free and hardy republicans, able to crush every daring invader of their rights. A formidable navy will spring from the bosom of the Atlantic States, ready to meet the maritime force of any nation. With such means, what will we have to fear from the arts or the arms of any Power, however formidable? I cannot, sir, but admire the difference between the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania and my honorable colleague, and how much the latter outstrips the former in the magnitude of his conceptions. The one advocates the resolutions to chastise an infraction of treaty; the other to maintain the balance of power. The one proposes to seize New Orleans; the other, New Orleans, the Floridas, and Louisiana. The one wishes to obtain and fortify the right of deposit; the other, to acquire an immense territory. The one is for vindicating the injuries of our western brethren; the other, rising on his muse of fire, is for avenging the wrongs of all mankind! However the honorable gentlemen may differ in other respects, they agree in professions of the warmest support of the Executive, if the Executive will follow their advice and pursue their plan. The honorable mover, carried away by the ardor of his feelings, has promised us, that he will play the orator—he will go among the people and stir up men's blood. "Then he will talk, good gods how he will talk!"—and after the minds of men are excited to a proper pitch by his eloquence, he will then play the soldier—he will march with his countrymen to the tented field! Like another Cincinnatus, he will relinquish the sweets of domestic life; and like another Curtius, leap into the gulf to save his country! My honorable colleague will not, indeed, proceed so far; but he has kindly promised us the aid of his oratory and the benefit of his counsels, although he cannot afford us the strength of his arm. And they pledge not only their own services, but the co-operation of all their political friends in the glorious crusade!

The well-disciplined and well-marshalled myrmidons, will follow their illustrious chief to victory or death. All will be united in support of the Administration; the disagreeable collisions that we now experience will be done away; and if we only admit their wooden horse within our walls, they will retire from the siege, and leave us in quiet possession of the Government! We thank the gentlemen for their kind proffers. We assure them that we will vindicate the honor of our country, but we will take our own time, and do it in our own way. We cannot consent to receive the dictation of the minority; and highly as we respect the wisdom of their sages, and the prowess of their warriors, we must dispense with them, if we cannot obtain them without the surrender of independence.

It is far from my disposition, sir, to insult over fallen men. Adversity is with me ever sacred, and I consider a great man struggling in the storms of fate, as a sight upon which the gods may look down with admiration. The two honorable gentlemen are soon to leave this House, and to retire into private life. One of them, my honorable colleague, has told us so more than once, or I should never have mentioned it. I sincerely wish them, in their retirement, all the happiness they can wish themselves. I hope that they will enjoy otium cum dignitate; but let me, sir, ask them, is it proper in them, at the time of their departure, to prescribe a course of action for those who are to follow them? Is it generous? Is it candid? Is it magnanimous in them to strew thorns and briars in the paths of their successors? To plant spring-guns and man-traps in their walks? To scuttle the ship they are about quitting, and to leave behind a dreadful legacy of death and destruction? I appeal to their own feelings, and to the feelings of every man who hears me, for an answer.

Mr. Ross thought he had given a very precise definition of major and minor rights; he considered the deprivation of the ordinary means of a country's subsistence, to be the deprivation of a major right; it was an essential right, and the definition was in point. This right has been cut off, and it was as much an aggression as if the whole means of subsistence of the Union, instead of the Western country, was involved. If, then, it was of this character, was it unreasonable; was it unjust; would it not rather be both just and reasonable, to employ force to seize upon and repossess ourselves of a right of which we were unjustly deprived? Ought we not to seize and to hold, until our security was established against danger of all further encroachment. The gentleman from New York (Mr. CLINTON) certainly misunderstood him on what related to the British Treaty. He did say that, when Genet was recalled, the British recalled their November orders, and the President then agreed to treat. He had been misconceived, also, in what regarded the troops; for Government did certainly direct a large body of troops to fall down the Mississippi; not Lieut. Pope's detachment, for he was long before on the Ohio; but troops were ordered from Tennessee to move downward; and had not the treaty been in consequence executed, and the line run, they would have executed it with the sword.

Mr. MORRIS said that it appeared to be discovered that he had contemplated engaging the United States in the restoration of the balance of power in Europe. Wonderful discovery! He had barely read an extract from the law of nations, which states, that the invasion of the rights of one nation, has a tendency to destroy the balance of power; his desire extended no farther than the undertaking of a bold measure, which may save us from the danger of internal war. He had been charged with a want of politeness; he conceived that he had shown both benevolence and politeness.

Mr. ROSS.—Gentlemen question what I assert as to the disposition of Spain to do our citizens justice. I did before say, and I do now say, that no man ever did, nor do I think that any man ever will obtain justice for the injuries done by Spain.

Mr. CLINTON.—As to the gentleman's opinions, he may possess internal evidence, to him more convincing than even a knowledge of facts to the contrary; what he had first asserted, was, that Spain had shown a disposition to do justice, nay, that so she had promised. The gentleman wishes to impress an opinion on the Senate, that Spain has refused to do us justice. Now, whatever internal evidence the gentleman may rely on, and however positive he may have been, or now be, I say that Spain has not refused.

The question being at length called for, on the motion of Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, for striking out the first section of the resolutions proposed by Mr. ROSS, the yeas and nays were required, and stood, 15 to 11, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Dayton, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Ross, Tracy, Wells, and White.

On the question for striking out the remaining parts of the resolutions, the question was also taken, and carried by the same votes on each side.

The question being then called for on the adoption of the amendments proposed by Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, the yeas and nays were called for, and the votes were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Dayton, Ellery, T. Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, J. Mason, Morris, Nicholas, Olcott, Plumer, Ross, Stone, Sumter, Tracy, Wells, and Wright.

NAYS—None.

So it was unanimously

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever he shall judge it expedient, to require of the Executives of the several States to take effectual measures to arm, and equip, according to law, and hold in readiness to march, at a moment's warning, eighty thousand effective militia, officers included.

Resolved, That the President may, if he judges it expedient, authorize the Executives of the several States to accept, as part of the detachment aforesaid, any corps of volunteers, who shall continue in service for such time not exceeding — months, and perform such services as shall be prescribed by law.

Resolved, That — dollars be appropriated for paying and subsisting such part of the troops aforesaid, whose actual service may be wanted, and for defraying such other expenses as, during the recess of Congress, the President may deem necessary for the security of the territory of the United States.

Resolved, That — dollars be appropriated for erecting, at such place or places on the Western waters as the President may judge most proper, one or more arsenals.

After the question was taken,

Mr. HILLHOUSE said he was opposed to the resolutions on a ground that he thought proper now to mention; the calling out the militia of the Eastern States, would be a very serious injury to them; he wished, as they were always well officered and disciplined, that they should not be called out—they were too distant. He hoped that, in reporting the bill, some amendment would be made, so as to limit the portion of militia to be called out; he did not care whether the line was the Potomac or the North river.

Mr. WRIGHT.—The gentleman from Connecticut was very liberal, so were all the gentlemen, of profession and zeal for the Western people. We now see how far it extends—it extends exactly to professions, and no more; for the gentleman tells you he does not care whether the Potomac or the North river is to be the boundary, which means, in other words, do not call upon us people of Connecticut for anything but our professions, you shall have them in abundance, and our prayers too; but as to our militia, they are so well officered and disciplined, that it would be cruel to call upon them to march south of the North river, or, at farthest, the Potomac.

The resolutions were referred to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, JACKSON, and SUMTER, to bring in a bill or bills accordingly.

The Senate then adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 26.

The bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. JACKSON, CLINTON, and STONE, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act to make Beaufort, the City of Washington, and Passamaquoddy, ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of St. Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario, and the appointment of a surveyor at Nanjemoy," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, T. FOSTER, and S. T. MASON, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for erecting a light-house at the entrance of Penobscot bay, or any other place in its vicinity that may be deemed preferable by the Secretary of the Treasury," was read the second time and referred to Messrs. T. FOSTER, ELLERY, and OLCOTT, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States,'" was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. NICHOLAS, BRADLEY, and DAYTON, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia,'" was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning the salt springs on the waters of Wabash river," was read the second time, and referred to the committee appointed, on the 25th of January last, on that part of the President's Message of the 18th of January which relates to the salt springs, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 18th instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Corp," reported it without amendment.

Ordered. That it lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington;" and it having been further amended,

Ordered. That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments reported on the 16th instant to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia;" and having agreed thereto, and further amended the bill,

Ordered. That it pass to the third reading as amended.

Ordered. That the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Moses White," pass to the third reading.

Ordered. That the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States,'" pass to the third reading.

Ordered. That the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States,'" pass to the third reading.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States,'" and to the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" and having amended the bill,

Ordered. That it pass to the third reading as amended.

Ordered. That the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and three," pass to the third reading.

7th Con. 2d Ses.—9

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act concerning the insurance of buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia;" and Ordered. That it be referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, BRADLEY, and LOGAN, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" and, also, the act supplementary thereto, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" and Ordered. That it be referred to Messrs. BRECKENRIDGE, MORRIS, and NICHOLAS, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to, and in modification of, the propositions contained in the act, entitled 'An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State, into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes,'" and Ordered. That it pass to the third reading.

Ordered. That the bill to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress pass to the third reading.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 23d instant, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and three," reported it without amendment; but on motion, sundry amendments were adopted.

Ordered. That this bill pass to the third reading as amended.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill to amend the acts providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio and above the mouth of Kentucky river; and Ordered. That it pass to the third reading.

DETACHMENT OF MILITIA, &c.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom the resolutions of yesterday were referred, reported a bill directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals; which was read; and, by unanimous consent, the rule was dispensed with, and the bill was read the second time.

Mr. HILLHOUSE moved that the bill be amended, by inserting a clause to limit the discretion of the President to a certain portion of the United States, in order to exclude Connecticut.

Mr. WRIGHT objected, and said he hoped the amendment would not obtain. He insisted that every portion of the Union ought to contribute its proportion in blood and treasure for the general defence, and had a right to expect an equal chance for the laurels of national glory. He had just received a letter from a veteran, whose brow was already decorated with Revolutionary laurels, expressing his unqualified approbation of the measures of negotiation adopted by our Government; but that if they failed, whereby our national honor should be committed, cripple as he was, he would crawl to the standard of liberty to assert our rights, and avenge our wrongs. That, as it was not expected that eighty thousand men would be necessary at any one point, therefore he did not incline to limit the discretion of the President as proposed by the amendment, but to leave him at large to exercise it as the current of events might direct. The eighty thousand volunteers would be nothing to the United States, but burdensome to a part, and those were the kind of troops relied on, in case of necessity, which he deprecated; he therefore should vote against it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE said he was sorry that the learned gentleman from Maryland did not understand his own bill, which he had for several days been advocating with so much ardor; that the amendment did not respect the volunteer corps, but only the militia; that the militia in his State would, instead of being organized, be disorganized thereby; that they were already well officered and disciplined, and he should be sorry to see them therefore disturbed; that he hoped the learned gentleman would read and understand it before he troubled the House again with his undignified remarks, and that he hoped the State of Maryland might be permitted to furnish what part she wished of the troops required.

Mr. NICHOLAS said that the gentleman from Maryland was certainly correct; that as he himself understood the bill, it authorized the President to make his requisition of the Governors of States, as he in his discretion might think fit to apportion them among the States, and that volunteer corps might be received in lieu of said militia; and he apprehended that the volunteer corps would of course be in the respective States, instead of the militia so required of their States.

Mr. DAYTON said he hoped the amendment would obtain; that it would certainly be better so qualified, by limiting the requisition to particular States, otherwise the President might feel himself cramped, and limited by the law to make his requisitions of the States in proportion to the militia of said several States respectively, which he did not incline to do; therefore, he hoped the amendment might obtain.

Mr. WRIGHT said, that he understood the bill as correctly as the gentleman introducing it did, seems now to be ascertained, by the observations of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NICHOLAS,) and that the sagacious gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. HILLHOUSE,) was himself mistaken; who wishes Maryland to be gratified by furnishing such portion of the requisition as she chooses. Sir, Maryland wishes no distinction in the distribution, either of dangers or of honors; nor, sir, will she ever ask to be excused from contributing her quota of blood or treasure in the defence of her violated rights; nor will she ever shrink from duty. But the honorable gentleman from Connecticut wishes to excuse his State; and says that taking any part of the requisition from Connecticut will, instead of organizing, disorganize their militia. He presumed if that would be the effect on Connecticut, it would have the like effect on other States, and he did not know why that State should be excused; he, for his part, should not excuse her. The gentleman, sir, has several times indulged himself with carping at observations with a degree of pointed asperity which I cannot submit to. To be knocked down by the thunder of Jupiter or the arm of Mars I should not regard, but against being hacked down with a dull tomahawk, even by a son of Alknoumak, every manly feeling of my heart revolts at.

The amendment obtained, and the bill was ordered to a third reading, as amended.

MONDAY, February 28.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Ray and John Follawell," reported it without amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 25th instant, the bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for militia services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, and for other purposes,'" reported amendments; which were read.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, the bill, entitled "An act to make Beaufort, the City of Washington, and Passamaquoddy, ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of St. Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario, and the appointment of a Surveyor at Nanjemoy," reported amendments, which were read.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, the bill, entitled "An act concerning the insurance of buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia," reported it without amendment.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, the bill, entitled "An act concerning the salt springs on the waters of the Wabash," reported amendments; which were read.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 17th instant, the bill, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary War," reported an amendment; which was not adopted.

Ordered, That this bill do pass to the third reading.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia,'" and oy, BALDWIN, and ROSS, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. TRA-

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joshua Harvey and others;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Paul Coulon;" and a bill, entitled "An act for reducing the marine corps of the United States;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The four bills last mentioned were read, and ordered to the second reading.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," be now read the second time.

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, BRADLEY, and SUMTER, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. JACKSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 26th instant, the bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," reported amendments; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill directing a detachment from the militia of the United States and for erecting certain arsenals, was read the third time, and having been further amended, and the blanks filled,

Resolved, That it pass, that it be engrossed, and that the title thereof be "An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals."

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States;'" and to the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States;'" was read the third time and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and three," was read the third time and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and three," was read the third time and further amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments. The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia," was read the third time, and further amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to, and in modification of, the propositions contained in the act, entitled 'An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," was read the third time.

Ordered, That it lie until to-morrow.

The bill, entitled "An act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington," was read the third time; and, on the question, Will the Senate concur in the final passage of this bill, as amended? it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, T. Foster, Howard, Morris, Nicholas, Ross, Tracy, Wells, White, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Cocke, Ellery, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Olcott, Plumer, Stone, and Sumter.

So the bill was lost.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Moses White," was read the third time and passed.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Corp;" and, on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Ray and John Follawell;" and, on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 25th instant, the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the transfer of the duties of supervisor to any other office," reported it without amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act, in addition to an act, entitled 'An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States,'" was read the third time and passed.

TUESDAY, March 1.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was yesterday referred the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia,'" reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 26th of February last, the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" and also the act supplementary thereto, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was yesterday referred the bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the Militia of the District of Columbia," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning the City of Washington," and a bill, entitled "An act for settling sundry claims to public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and ordered to the second reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the credentials of ISRAEL SMITH, elected a Senator of the United States for the State of Vermont, for six years, commencing on the fourth day of March, 1803; and they were read and ordered to lie on file.

The bill, entitled "An act to reduce the Marine Corps of the United States," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. BRADLEY, TRACY, and LOGAN, to consider and report thereon.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Paul Coulon," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, ANDERSON, and OLCOTT, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joshua Harvey and others," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. WRIGHT, BRADLEY, and ANDERSON, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee to whom was referred "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States,'" reported it without amendment.

Ordered. That it pass to a third reading.

Mr. T. FOSTER, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for erecting a light-house at the entrance of Penobscot bay, or any other place, in its vicinity, that may be deemed preferable by the Secretary of the Treasury," reported the same without amendment.

Ordered. That it pass to a third reading.

Ordered. That the committee on the petition of Cloe Strong be discharged.

The bill, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds, received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war," was read a third time and passed as amended.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to, and in modification of, the proposition contained in the act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning the insurance of buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia," was considered, and passed to a third reading.

The consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to amend the acts providing for the sale of the lands of the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river," was resumed. And on the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,' and for other purposes," were considered; and it was agreed that the bill pass to a third reading.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the transfer of the duties of supervisor to any other office," was considered, and passed to a third reading.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to make Beaufort, the City of Washington, and Passamaquoddy, ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of St. Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario; and the appointment of a surveyor at Nanjemoy, were considered and adopted; and the bill passed to a third reading as amended.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," were considered and agreed to.

Ordered. That this bill pass to a third reading as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Henrick," in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. The bill last mentioned was read, and ordered to a second reading.

Ordered. That the petition of Aaron Man be referred to the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, to consider and report thereon at the next session of Congress.

WEDNESDAY, March 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides, and the ballots being collected and counted, the whole number was found to be 18, of which 10 make a majority:

Mr. Bradley had 13, Mr. Morris 3, Mr. Hillhouse 1, and Mr. Logan 1.

Consequently, the Hon. STEPHEN R. BRADLEY was elected President of the Senate pro tempore.

Ordered. That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States, and acquaint him that, in the absence of the Vice President, they have elected the Hon. STEPHEN R. BRADLEY President of the Senate pro tempore.

MARCH, 1803.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Ordered, That the Secretary make a like communication to the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of JAMES HILLHOUSE, elected by the State of Connecticut a Senator of the United States for six years, commencing with the fourth day of March current; and they were read and ordered to lie on file.

Mr. TRACY, to whom was referred, on the first instant, the bill, entitled "An act for reducing the Marine Corps of the United States," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Paul Coulon," be discharged; and that the bill be postponed to the fourth day of March next.

The bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Henrick," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, JACKSON, and MORRIS, to consider and report thereon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of duty on sugar refined within the United States;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to prolong the continuation of the Mint at Philadelphia;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last mentioned were read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to dispense with the rule, and that the bill, entitled "An act to prolong the continuation of the Mint at Philadelphia," be now read a second time.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning the City of Washington," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. TRACY, LOGAN, and CLINTON, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States," was read the third time, and amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

The bill, entitled "An act to make Beaufort, the City of Washington, and Passamaquoddy, ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of Saint Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario; and the appointment of a surveyor at Nanjemoy;" was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass as amended.

The bill to amend the act, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia;" and, also, the act supplementary thereto, entitled "An act concerning the District of Columbia," was read the third time.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until the fourth day of March next.

The Senate resumed the second reading of the bill, entitled "An act for reducing the Marine Corps of the United States;" and, on motion to postpone this bill to the fourth day of March next, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Hillhouse, Howard, Jackson, Logan, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Ross, Stone, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Sumter and Wright.

The bill, entitled "An act, in addition to the act, entitled 'An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia,'" was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joshua Harvey, and others," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning the insurance on buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," was read the third time and further amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning the salt springs on the waters of the Wabash river," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act, in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,' and for other purposes," was read the third time.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The bill, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," was read the third time.

On motion that the further consideration thereof be postponed, it passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Hillhouse, Howard, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Stone, Tracy, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Sumter, White, and Wright.

preferable by the Secretary of the Treasury," was read the third time and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the transfer of the duties of supervisor to any other office," was read the third time.

Ordered, That it lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, March 3.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Attorney General, stating that, in obedience to the order of April 15th, 1802, he had applied for the documents necessary to enable him to report; which, although not yet obtained, his attention and inquiries for the accomplishment of the object should be continued with such means as he was possessed of, or should be placed within his reach.

The bill, entitled "An act to prolong the continuation of the Mint at Philadelphia," was read the third time and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three;" whereupon,

Resolved, That the Senate do insist on their said amendment, desire a conference thereon, and that Messrs. JACKSON and ROSS be the managers on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they disagree to the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary war."

The Senate took into consideration their amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary war."

Resolved, That they do recede from their said amendment.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. RANDOLPH, two of the members of said House, in the words following:

"Mr. President: We are commanded, in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States, to impeach John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same. We are further commanded to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment."

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joshua Harvey and others," was read the third time; and on the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 12, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Breckenridge, Cocke, T. Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, Olcott, Plumer, Ross, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Clinton, Logan, Nicholas, and Stone.

Whereupon, Resolved, That this bill pass.

The bill, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of the duty on sugar refined within the United States," was read the second time, and referred to Messrs. HOWARD, WELLS, and ROSS, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the bill, entitled "An act concerning the city of Washington," reported amendments, which were read and agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the transfer of the duties of supervisor to any other office;" and Resolved, That this bill pass.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brigantine Henrick," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the 4th of March.

The Senate took into consideration the bill, entitled "An act for settling sundry claims to public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee." And, on the question, Shall this bill be now read the second time? it passed in the negative. So the bill was lost.

Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives, respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, judge of the district court, be referred to Messrs. TRACY, CLINTON, and NICHOLAS, to consider and report thereon.

On motion, the Senate adjourned to six o'clock this evening.

THURSDAY EVENING, SIX O'CLOCK.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed on the subject, made the following report, which was adopted, and the House of Representatives notified accordingly:

"Whereas the House of Representatives have this day, by two of their members, Messrs. Nicholson and Randolph, at the bar of the Senate, impeached John Pickering, judge of the district court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and have acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same: and have likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering to answer to the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives."

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives of this resolution.

MARCH, 1803.

Adjournment.

SENATE.

Mr. HOWARD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to allow a drawback of duty on sugar refined within the United States," reported it without amendment.

On the question, Shall this bill pass to the third reading? it was determined in the negative. So the bill was lost.

A motion was made that it be

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to the election of a Secretary, and the other officers of the Senate, at the commencement of the next session.

On which a motion was made to postpone this resolution until the 4th day of March next; and the question of postponement was determined in the affirmative—yeas 15, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Bradley, Cocke, T. Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, Jackson, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Stone, Sumter, Tracy, Wells, and White.

NAYS—Messrs. Breckenridge, Clinton, Ellery, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, and Wright.

Ordered, That Messrs. WRIGHT and COCKE be a committee on the part of the Senate, with such as the House of Representatives may join, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that, unless he may have any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives concur in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed adjournment of the two Houses of Congress, and have appointed a committee on their part.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate pay to Doctor GANTT, one of the Chaplains to Congress, for the present session, one hundred dollars, out of the contingent fund, in addition to the allowance to which he is by law entitled.

Mr. WRIGHT reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that he informed the committee that he had no further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress.

In Executive session, the Senate resumed the consideration of the Convention between the United States and His Catholic Majesty, concluded at Madrid, August 11, 1802.

And, on the question, Will the Senate consent and advise to the ratification thereof? it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, T. Foster, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, and Sumter.

NAYS—Messrs. Hillhouse, Howard, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, White, and Wright.

So the question was lost, two-thirds of the Senators present not consenting thereto.

On motion, it was agreed to reconsider the last vote; and on the question, Shall the consideration of this convention be postponed? it passed in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, T. Foster, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Stone, Sumter, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Hillhouse, Howard, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White.

So it was Resolved, That the consideration of this convention be postponed.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

On motion, the Senate adjourned to the first Monday in November next.

DOLPH, Jr. and JOHN TALIAFERRO, Jr.; and from South Carolina, WILLIAM BUTLER; appeared and took their seats in the House.

A petition of William Murray and others, practitioners of law in the Mississippi Territory, was presented to the House and read, stating that extraordinary pains have been taken to circulate a petition in the said Territory expressive of a number of requests, and among others "that the offices of Territorial judges of that government be abolished;" and praying that the said offices may not be discontinued, and that the present judges may hold the same during good behaviour.

Also, the petitions of sundry citizens of the Mississippi Territory were presented to the House and read, respectively praying that the land office to be opened for the said Territory may be held within the bounds of the same, and that the actual settlers on the vacant lands of the United States may have a pre-emption right secured to them; that the right of suffrage may be extended to every male person of full age, being a citizen of the United States, and who has had his residence within the said Territory for the last six months preceding the election; that all officers of the Territorial government be appointed by the Governor of the Territory, by and with the advice and consent of the Council; that the offices of the Territorial judges be abolished; and that the appointment of all judicial officers of the said Territory be made by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Council; and that they shall be removable only by impeachment; and also, that the members of the Legislative Council be henceforth chosen at the same time, in the same manner, and for the same term, as the members of the House of Representatives of the said Territory.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the committee appointed on the eleventh instant, to whom was referred the petition of James Doherty and others, citizens of the Mississippi Territory; that they do examine the matter thereof and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House; and that Messrs. LOWNDES and DICKSON be added to the said committee.

Ordered, That a bill for the relief of Henry Messonier, the memorial of the said Henry Messonier, with the vouchers accompanying the same, presented the third day of February, and a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures thereon, made the eighth of March last, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

A message from the Senate informed the House that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business; and that, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, the Senate have elected the honorable STEPHEN R. BRADLEY their President pro tempore.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the PRESIDENT of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

The House proceeded to consider the said message of the Senate: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the same; and that Messrs. DAWSON, LOWNDES, and VAN NESS, be appointed a committee, on the part of this House, for the purpose expressed therein.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of the ninth instant, for the appointment of Chaplains; and the motion was again read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That two Chaplains of different denominations, be appointed to Congress, for the present session, one by each House, to interchange weekly.

The question was taken that the House do agree to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States; and that the said committee have power to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. SOUTHARD, CLOPTON, BOUDE, FOSTER, HASTINGS, MERIWETHER, and HENDERSON, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Resolved, That the committee appointed on the subject of post offices and post roads, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law to prevent postmasters becoming contractors for carrying the mail.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, jointly, with the committee on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them, reported that the committee had performed that service; and that the President signified to them, that he would make a communication to this House to-morrow, by way of message.

Ordered, That a committee of Ways and Means be appointed, pursuant to the standing rules and orders of the House.

And a committee was appointed, of Messrs. RANDOLPH, GRISWOLD, SMILIE, READ, NICHOLSON, VAN RENSSELAER, and HOLLAND.

WEDNESDAY, December 15.

Another member, to wit: EDWIN GRAY, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House for the appointment of Chaplains to Congress for the present session; and have appointed the Rev. Dr. GANTT, on their part.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of this House; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Reverend WILLIAM PARKINSON.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

DECEMBER, 1802.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. LEWIS, his Secretary, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I am directed by the President of the United States to hand you a communication, in writing, from the President to the two Houses of Congress.

And he delivered in the same, together with the accompanying documents. The said communication was read. [For which, see proceedings in the Senate of this date.]

Ordered, That the said communication, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

THURSDAY, December 16.

Two other members, to wit: LUCAS ELMENDORF, from New York, and DANIEL HEISTER, from Maryland, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand eight hundred and three; also, a statement of the receipts and expenditures at the Treasury of the United States, for one year, preceding the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and two; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Ordered, That the petition of Memucan Hunt, and others, addressed to the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina; also, sundry resolutions of the said Assembly, respecting a claim of the petitioners for the value of certain lands in the State of Tennessee, held under grants from the State of North Carolina, prior to the cession of the said lands to the United States, presented to the House on the nineteenth of January; together with the report of a select committee thereon, made the twenty-fourth of March last; be referred to a Committee of the whole House on the first Monday of January next.

FRIDAY, December 17.

Two other members, to wit: from South Carolina, BENJAMIN HUGER, and JOHN RUTLEDGE, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several resolutions thereupon, which were read, as follows:

1. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the discriminating and countervailing duties, and the act of the British Parliament on that subject, ought to be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

2. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our finances, ought to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

3. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to our concerns with the Indian tribes, and the establishment of a new settlement, ought to be referred to a Select Committee.

4. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to our Navy Yards, and the building of docks, ought to be referred to a Select Committee.

5. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the President's Message as relates to providing for the return of American seamen discharged in foreign ports, and left abroad, be referred to a Select Committee.

6. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the President's Message as refers to the warfare with Tripoli, and to the relation with the other Barbary Powers, be referred to a Select Committee.

7. Resolved, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the Militia Institution of the United States, be referred to a Select Committee.

8. Resolved, as the opinion of this committee, That so much of the President's Message as relates to the fostering of the fisheries of the United States, be referred to a Select Committee.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolutions at the Clerk's table; and the same being again read, were agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That Mr. DAWSON, Mr. THOMAS MORRIS, Mr. HOGE, Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. MERIWETHER, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the third resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. MITCHILL, Mr. RUTLEDGE, Mr. HANNA, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. MOTT, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the fourth resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. JOSIAH SMITH, Mr. WOODS, and Mr. GRAY, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the fifth resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. PERKINS, Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. TILLINGHAST, and Mr. TALIAFERRO, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the sixth resolution.

Ordered. That Mr. VARNUM, Mr. UPHAM, Mr. JOHN SMITH, of Virginia, Mr. HELMS, Mr. BROWN, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. DANIEL HEISTER, Mr. STANTON, and Mr. STANFORD, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the seventh resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. HUGER, Mr. BISHOP, Mr. JOSEPH HEISTER, Mr. JOHN TRIGG, and Mr. VAN NESS, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the eighth resolution.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the acts, the one entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States;" the other entitled "An act supplementary to the "Act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," as relates to the establishment of a Mint, ought to be repealed.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that there had been a recent occurrence, in which every member of the House was interested, though every member might not, perhaps, possess competent information respecting it. He said it would be useless in him to impress the magnitude of a subject that related to the free navigation of the Mississippi, which materially affected a district of country growing every day in wealth and importance, and which it behooved the whole United States to cherish and protect. He moved, therefore, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such papers as are in the possession of the Department of State, as relate to the violation on the part of Spain, of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, between the United States of America and the King of Spain."

This resolution was agreed to unanimously, and Messrs. RANDOLPH and HUGER appointed the committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any and what alterations are necessary in the laws imposing duties on tonnage, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States.

Ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, December 20.

Several other members to wit: from Vermont, ISRAEL SMITH; and from Virginia, RICHARD BRENT, and MATTHEW CLAY; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report, and sundry documents, marked A, B, and C, prepared in obedience to the directions of "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Treasury Department,'" which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing a report of the Commissioners of the Fund of Navy Pensions; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the payment of debentures which have been issued for drawback of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported to New Orleans; and to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred, on the eighth instant, the petition of Richard Wilson and of Nathaniel Seager, reported a bill for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Ordered, That a bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States," passed the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, which was presented to this House at the last session, be referred to the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message, of the fifteenth instant, as relates to the militia institution of the United States.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this House a statement of the militia, according to the returns last received from the respective States.

Ordered, That Mr. MATTOON and Mr. JACKSON be appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

PETITION OF SAMUEL CORP.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. VARNUM in the Chair, on the report on the petition of Samuel Corp.

The following is the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures:

"That it appears to the committee that the petitioner was interested in a ship which sailed for London, early in the year 1799, for the purpose of purchasing a cargo proper for the New Orleans market. That the ship arrived in the month of August following at New York, having on board a cargo agreeably to order, none of which was intended to be landed within the United States. That the captain's manifest which he presented to the collector, declared his cargo for exportation; but not having made the same declaration on the copy of the manifest which he had delivered to the first boarding officer, the owners were compelled to enter the cargo, and give bond for the duties on the same. That no part of the cargo was landed except some bird shot. It appears also, that the collector granted a clearance for New Orleans, and issued debentures of drawback on the cargo; but on application for payment, the petitioner was informed that the law of March 2d, 1799, precluded him from being paid: The petitioner, therefore, prays relief from Congress.

"This case having been fully understood at the last session, the committee consider it unnecessary to go into any reasoning thereon. They submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted, and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to bring in a bill conformably thereto."

Mr. S. SMITH advocated the report.

Mr. GRISWOLD, though inclined to allow the prayer of the petition, thought a general provision ought to be made for all similar cases. With this view, it was moved that the Committee rise.

Carried; when the Committee was discharged, and the petition of Samuel Corp, and the report thereon, were recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, with instructions to inquire into the propriety of providing by law for the payment of debentures that have been issued for drawback of duty on goods, wares, and merchandise, exported to New Orleans.

TUESDAY, December 21.

Another member, to wit: JOHN CAMPBELL, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from John Beckley, Clerk of this House, stating "that he has been applied to by several of the members, under the order of the House for supplying them with newspapers, to direct that a number of any weekly papers for which they may subscribe, equivalent to the value and supply of a daily paper, may be furnished to them, in lieu of such daily paper; that he does not know that any such construction of the order of the House has ever been acted upon; and, as it will necessarily involve some additional expense to the public, he has not thought himself at liberty to incur it, without the express authority of the House."

Mr. CLAIBORNE, after passing an eulogium on the character and conduct of John Beckley, Esq., moved that the order of the House relative to newspapers be read. Agreed to.

Mr. GRISWOLD wished to know what had been the practice; whatever that was, it should be uniform; he had been informed, that it was the practice of last session, and he believed it had been that of former ones, to receive an equivalent number of copies, to the price of a daily paper.

The SPEAKER said that it had been usual, at all former sessions, within his recollection, to receive an equivalent to the price of a daily paper. He had given that construction to the rule.

The said letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of the members of the First and Second Branches of the City Council of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, stating various matters relative to the police and government of the said city and its inhabitants; and praying that the propositions submitted by the memorialists may be adopted by Congress, in addition to, or modification of, the several regulations prescribed by the acts heretofore passed on that subject.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. VAN NESS, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. PLATER, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. JACKSON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the County of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will be pleased to pass a law, placing such persons, within the said County of Alexandria, as may choose to join a society heretofore incorporated by an act of the Legislature of the State of Virginia, by the name of "The Mutual Assurance Society against Fire on Buildings, of the State of Virginia," as well as those who are now members, on the same footing with citizens of the said State, that the benefits of the Society may be extended to such of the petitioners whose buildings are now exposed to destruction by fire, without hope of restitution.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. BRENT, Mr. VAN HORN, and Mr. TALLMADGE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the subject of the Mint.

Mr. GRISWOLD said the House had not yet received the report of the Director of the Mint. He thought it better to wait till it was received, as they would then better understand the state of the Mint, and the expenses attending it. The report might be sent in within the course of a week.

Motion of Mr. RANDOLPH lost—ayes 25.

IMPORTATION OF FIRE-ARMS.

Mr. RUTLEDGE observed that the State of South Carolina had lately taken measures for a supply of arms for her militia. He thought that an object so great and desirable ought to be encouraged by the General Government, by exempting arms imported under such circumstances from duty. He therefore offered a resolution purporting that any State, importing pieces of ordnance, fire or side arms for their militia, should be exempted from the payment of duties.

Mr. RANDOLPH said the resolution proposed contained some important principles. Its adoption would affect the revenue in some degree; and would, in a still greater degree, affect home manufactures, especially those the most essential to the good of the community. It did appear to him, that if any manufacture required the aid of protecting duties, it was the manufacture of arms, in preference to all others. The resolution embraced not only ordnance, but fire-arms also. He was not prepared to say that a distinction ought not to be made between these two descriptions of arms. For these reasons he wished the resolution to lie on the table.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he had no objection to its resting for a day or two; when, on motion of Mr. RANDOLPH, it was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Monday.

NEWSPAPERS FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. MITCHILL revived the subject of Mr. Beckley's letter by introducing the following resolution:

Resolved, That if any member of this House shall choose to take any newspaper published once, twice, or thrice a week, instead of a daily paper, he shall be furnished with as many of such papers as shall not exceed the price of a daily paper.

Mr. SMILE said he did not know why so many papers were necessary—they were taken for their own use; why have five or six of the same kind? He did not think it right for the public to pay for papers to send away; he could form no construction of the rule that would warrant it.

Mr. DANA had always received an equivalent to three daily papers; it was the construction he had put upon the rule of the House, and he knew that other gentlemen had acted upon the same principle.

Mr. STANLEY opposed the motion of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHILL.) He should not have thought such an expression of the will of the House necessary, had it not been called for by the letter of the Clerk. Mr. S. said he was one of those alluded to by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) who having at the last and present sessions selected, on public account, papers not published daily, received a number equivalent to a daily paper. He believed this had been the case with every member of the House. If a different rule had been observed by any gentleman, he doubted it would be declared. He was compelled to believe the printers' accounts had been settled, and their charges at the rate of daily papers allowed. He could not but express the surprise he felt at this application from the Clerk, who now called on the House to express their sense of a resolution, to which he (the Clerk) had so long and uniformly given his own construction.

The Mint.

H. OF R.

Mr. RUTLEDGE had hoped that, after the explanation from the Speaker, the House would have been saved the trouble of this resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHILL.) He considered the resolution, to furnish papers, not made for the sole use of the members; they were to be sent to their constituents, in order that those who live at a distance from presses may be informed of the proceedings in the National Councils. I cannot agree with the gentleman on my left, (Mr. SMILIE.) I think he must be mistaken in the object of that resolution. It has been the practice in Philadelphia, with respect to the Universal Gazette, to take as many of the weekly as were an equivalent to a daily paper. I cannot conceive the necessity of the Clerk's troubling the House, especially as the practice now in use has been sanctioned by himself. He could wish the gentleman from New York would withdraw his motion, as he thought it unnecessary; but if he would not, he should vote for it.

Mr. ELMER was opposed to the motion.

The question was taken on Mr. MITCHILL's resolution, and carried, 50 voting in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, December 22.

Another member, to wit: JOHN ARCHER, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with the information requested in your resolutions of the seventeenth instant.

In making this communication, I deem it proper to observe, that I was led by the regard due to the rights and interests of the United States, and to the just sensibility of the portion of our fellow-citizens more immediately affected by the irregular proceeding at New Orleans, to lose not a moment in causing every step to be taken which the occasion claimed from me; being equally aware of the obligation to maintain, in all cases, the rights of the nation, and to employ, for that purpose, those just and honorable means which belong to the character of the United States.

Dec. 22, 1802.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The said Message, and the papers referred to therein, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States.'"

Mr. T. MORRIS submitted a resolution, instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire whether any and what alterations are necessary in the act supplementary to the act laying a direct tax. He stated his object to be the postponement of the time of selling lands for the non-payment of taxes; the necessity of which arose from the confused manner in which the assessment had been made in a part of the State (New York) which he represented. Agreed to.

THE MINT.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, in order to renew a motion which he had made yesterday, and on which—being called to the door when some objections were urged against it—he was surprised to find himself in a small minority. Understanding that the refusal to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on his motion for abolishing the Mint, was the effect of a desire on the part of the House to receive the report of the Director of that institution, for the past year, he would endeavor to show that the House were already in possession of competent information, and that it could not be affected by any communication which the head of that department might make. If this were a subject novel to the House, and of an undigested nature, he should readily acknowledge his motion to have been premature; nor would it, under those circumstances, have been submitted to the House. But, on examination, it would appear that the subject had been matured during the last session; that information of the most satisfactory nature had been received from the Director; and a bill actually passed the House. That information, if it were not in the recollection of every member of the House, was accessible to all of them. It stated explicitly that the machinery would not last, without repair, longer than another year—this, he presumed, had not renewed itself; that the horses were so old that it would be necessary, at the end of the year, to replace them by others—these had not, he supposed, grown younger; that the lot was too circumscribed, and this, he imagined, had not enlarged its limits; that the expense of the institution could not, by any new arrangements, be reduced below twenty thousand dollars. The Director had not only recommended a change of the site, but of the modus operandi of the machinery of the Mint, by supplying the labor of horses by steam. Upon this information the House had acted last session. No general election having intervened, he must presume that no change of sentiment had taken place. He, therefore, thought he had a right to consider this subject as perfectly matured, and there being no other business before the House, hoped it would be taken up; although he was not surprised at the reluctance of those gentlemen who cherished the institution as one of the insignia of sovereignty, to act upon it. This aspect of the subject could not, however, be changed by any report of the detailed operations of the Mint. He, therefore, moved that the House, agreeably to the order of the day, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution to repeal so much of the laws on the subject of the Mint as relate to the establishing of a Mint.

H. OF R.

The Mint.

DECEMBER, 1802.

Mr. GREGG considered the motion to go into the discussion of the subject at this time premature. He was among those members who were not present at the late period of the last session when the repealing act passed, having previously retired from the House. It would be recollected that the appointed time for the Director of the Mint to make his annual report was the first Monday of January. That period is so near that he thought it most advisable not to proceed to act on the subject until possessed of the information that document might furnish. Though the institution had not been considered as having operated much to the public good, yet the operation of it during the last year may perhaps change their opinions respecting it. He, therefore, moved to postpone the consideration of the motion to the second Monday in January.

Mr. SMITH said he did not concur in opinion with his colleague. If members were absent when this subject was acted upon, it was their own fault; and that circumstance was certainly no argument for delay. Did he, however, believe that any new information could rationally be expected from the report of the Director of the Mint, he should not be for taking up the subject now. But of this he had no expectation. At present, there was no business before the House. The committees appointed would soon make their reports, and then the House would be engaged with other subjects, to the neglect of this. Let us then take up this subject now, enter upon its discussion, and if, in the progress of our inquiries we want information, it will be then time enough to postpone it.

Mr. SOUTHARD was in favor of the postponement. There were now present a number of gentlemen not members at the period of discussion during the last session. They have no documents, and cannot be correctly informed. He saw no advantage in entering upon the discussion at this time, as new and additional information may be received from the report of the Director. It had been said there was no business before the House; but there was business; there was a bill upon their table, why not take that up and act upon it?

Mr. RANDOLPH called for the reading of a document that would throw clear and full light upon the subject; not light of that fleeting kind that may be derived from an annual report. From this document sufficient information could be had to convince any member that we might act as well now as at any other time.

[The Clerk read a report from the Director of the Mint, received during the last session, stating the real and personal property attached to the Mint; that the machinery might last for one year; that the horses may last a year; that to conduct the operations of the Mint to advantage, steam should be used instead of horses; that the lot on which the Mint is erected was too small; and that a less annual sum than seventeen or eighteen thousand dollars would not provide for the establishment.]

Mr. GRISWOLD observed that he was informed yesterday by a gentleman from Massachusetts, not now in his place, that the coins issued the current year would exceed in value five hundred thousand dollars. He did not state this from his own knowledge. But if it should appear from the report of the Director to be the fact, he thought it would satisfy every member, that though the establishment was an expense to the Treasury, yet it was no expense to the nation; for the exportation of bullion to that amount, to be coined, and the importation of it thereafter, would cost at least five per cent.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he would state a fact, which was, that notwithstanding all the issues from the Mint, no member sees a coin. For himself he had not seen a piece of gold coined in the Mint for two years. This he considered a sufficient answer to the remarks of the gentleman last up.

Mr. LOWNDES said the remark of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) was not correct, as he had seen many pieces of American coin. But he could assign a satisfactory reason for the appearance of so little gold in ordinary circulation. It was the practice of the banks to count over once a month the specie in their vaults. This trouble was considerably lessened by depositing gold instead of silver. He had been credibly assured that there was now in the vaults of the banks of the United States gold, in eagles and half eagles, to the amount of two millions of dollars.

Mr. DENNIS was not for precipitating measures. He was one of those who were in favor of a serious and candid inquiry into the merits of the institution. He was not in favor of retaining it merely as an emblem of sovereignty. He believed that the sun rising would set, and he believed also that the independence and sovereignty of the nation could be as well preserved without as with the Mint. But he believed it proper to receive information that would enable them to decide whether the institution, so far from being useless, may not be useful and profitable. They were not prepared to say whether the copper coinage at least should not be retained. From some information received the last session, that department of the establishment appeared to be profitable.

Mr. D. said that, if, on full inquiry, the establishment appeared to be a drain on the Treasury, he should be for abolishing it; but he should not, on immature information, be for abolishing an institution, coeval with the Government, and founded on good reasons. The reasons adduced by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) were insufficient. So far as related to the horses, he believed there were only four employed, and Drawbacks.

the purchase of four fresh ones would be a very unimportant consideration. Another argument was drawn from the smallness of the lot on which the Mint stands. Though it might be better conducted on a more extensive lot, yet he was not satisfied, notwithstanding present disadvantages, that it might not be profitably conducted, at least so far as regarded a copper coinage. For these reasons he thought it proper to wait a few days, in order to receive information that would enable them to understand the points on which their decision may ultimately turn.

Mr. HUGER assigned his reasons for being in favor of a postponement, coincident with those already given. He considered it proper to wait until the Director's report was received. They could then avail themselves of the experience of another year, under auspices more favorable, perhaps, than those of preceding years. He thought it proper to wait, that they might see whether there had not been more economy than usual in the expenses of the last year.

The question was then taken on Mr. GREGG's motion to postpone the subject till the second Monday in January, and carried—ayes 47, noes 28.

DRAWBACKS.

On motion of Mr. S. SMITH, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. VARNUM in the Chair, on the bill to allow a drawback of duties on goods exported to New Orleans, and therein to amend the act entitled, "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage." The bill is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the debentures for drawbacks of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, which have been exported from the United States, previous to the sixth day of February, one thousand eight hundred, for the port of New Orleans, on the river Mississippi, may be paid at the respective offices of the customs, on the terms and conditions prescribed by law in cases of exportation, for the benefit of drawback, to any foreign port or place, other than the dominions of a foreign State immediately adjoining the United States."

Mr. S. SMITH spoke in favor of the bill, and explained the grounds on which it had been brought in, and its operation.

Mr. ELMENDORF opposed it, and moved the rising of the Committee, that it might be recommended to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, with instructions to extend its provision to cases wherein debentures of drawback had not been issued—not pledging himself, however, to support it, even if so amended.

Messrs. S. SMITH, MITCHILL, and DANA, spoke against the Committee rising, and in favor of the bill.

The motion for the Committee to rise was lost without a division.

Mr. MACON then spoke against the bill, and Mr. S. SMITH replied; when the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

The House immediately took up the report, and on the question of engrossing the bill for a third reading, the House divided—ayes 34, noes 34.

The SPEAKER declaring himself in the negative the bill was lost.

THURSDAY, December 23.

Another member, to wit: LEWIS R. MORRIS, from Vermont, appeared and took his seat in the House.

A Message, was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In pursuance of the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the third of May last, desiring a statement of expenditures from January first, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, by the Quartermaster General and the Navy Agents, for the contingencies of naval and military establishments, and the navy contracts for timber and stores, I now transmit such statements from the offices of the Secretaries of the Treasury, War, and Navy, where alone these expenditures are entered.

DEC. 23, 1802.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The said Message was read, and, together with the documents accompanying it, ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Edward Tiffin, President of the Convention of the State of Ohio, enclosing an address to this House from the said Convention, approving "the prompt and decisive measures taken by Congress at their last session, to enable the people of the Northwestern Territory to emerge from their colonial government, and to assume a rank among the sister States;" also, expressing "their unequivocal approbation of the measures pursued by the present administration of the General Government, and of both Houses of Congress, in diminishing the public burdens, cultivating peace with all nations, and promoting the happiness and prosperity of our country."

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from Thomas Worthington, an agent appointed by the Convention of the said State of Ohio, enclosing a copy of the Constitution of said State, and an ordinance passed by the Convention, containing certain propositions for the consideration of Congress; which were read, and, together with the address of said Convention to this House, and the letter accompanying it, ordered to be referred to Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. ARCHER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. VARNUM in the Chair, on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the petition of John Holland, jr.

The report is in favor of granting the prayer of the petitioner for a remission of duties, in proportion to the damage sustained by his vessel taking fire on the night of entering the goods imported in her, and before they were landed.

The report was supported by Messrs. S. SMITH,

DANA, and EUSTIS, and opposed by Messrs. MASON, and GREGG.

Mr. GRISWOLD, though from present impressions in favor of the report, thought it did not comprehend all the facts necessary to form a full judgment respecting it. He therefore moved the rising of the Committee.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH supported the motion, which was carried; when, on motion of Mr. GRISWOLD, the report was recommitted to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

FRIDAY, December 25.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM H. HILL, from North Carolina, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting abstracts of the returns made by the Collectors of the Customs within the United States, of registered and impressed American seamen; also, a report exhibiting an abstract of communications received from agents of the United States, for the relief and protection of the said seamen; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, that Natchez be a port of delivery.

Mr. THOMAS called the attention of the House to a part of the unfinished business of the last session. A bill to extinguish the claims of the United States for balances reported against certain States, &c., was postponed during the last session to the 4th Monday in November. He moved the reference of so much of the report of the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business as related to this subject to a select committee. Ayes 26.—Lost.

Mr. MORRIS observed, that, if in order, he would move the reference of so much of the report of Revisal and Unfinished Business as related to the petition of C. L'Enfant to the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER said this would be irregular, as it would involve the reference of a report of the Committee of Claims to the Secretary, which was contrary to the practice of the House.

Mr. MORRIS afterwards moved the reference of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Mr. L'Enfant to a Committee of the Whole on Monday week. Carried.

Mr. M. then moved that the Secretary of State be directed to furnish this House with such documents as are in his possession, relating to the claim of C. L'Enfant for services rendered in laying out the City of Washington under the direction of the President of the United States. Agreed to.

MONDAY, December 27.

Ordered, That five hundred copies, in addition to the number already printed, of the letter and report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and sundry accompanying documents, prepared in obedience to the directions of "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Treasury Department,'" which were laid before the House on the twentieth instant, be printed for the use of the members of this House.

CASE OF J. P. VAN NESS.

Mr. DAVIS observed that he was of opinion that a member of the House retained his seat contrary to the spirit and sense of the Constitution. It therefore became his duty to offer a resolution for instituting an inquiry into the subject, in doing which he disclaimed all personal view. He then made the following motion:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire whether John P. Van Ness, one of the members of this House from the State of New York, returned by said State to serve as one of its members in the seventh Congress of the United States, has not, since his election as a member of this House, and since he occupied a seat as a member, accepted of, and exercised the office of a major of militia, under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia, and thereby forfeited his right to a seat as a member of this House.

Mr. MITCHILL considered the point as interesting in two relations; that which involved the decision of a principle, and that which went to deprive the State, (New York,) one of whose representatives he was, of a member. For these reasons he hoped the business would not be immediately pressed. He acknowledged this was not the first intimation he had received of the contemplation of such a motion; but he had entertained a hope that the gentleman with whom it originated, had, on reflection, considered it not inconsistent with his duty to abandon it.

Mr. DAVIS replied, that he felt no disposition to press a decision. He had communicated, the first day he took his seat, his ideas on the subject to certain members, the friends of the gentleman implicated by the resolution, in hopes that he would resign. He now entertained no wish to push the business. He supposed, however, that the resolution would, of course, go to the Committee of Elections. He repeated that he was governed by no personal prejudice, but entirely by a sense of duty. He concluded with saying he was in favor of the question of reference being immediately taken.

But on Mr. MITCHILL repeating his desire for some delay, Mr. DAVIS agreed to let the resolution lie till to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 28.

Two other members, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN STRATTON; and from North Carolina, WILLIAM BARRY GROVE, appeared and took their seats in the House.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a plan and estimates for a dry dock. The Message and the reports and estimates referred therein, were read, and, together with the plans accompanying the same, ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message of the fifteenth instant, as relates to our navy yards, and the building of docks.

DECEMBER, 1802.

Letter from James McHenry.

H. OF R.

LETTER OF JAMES McHENRY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him from James McHenry, late Secretary for the War Department, containing a variety of observations on the subject-matter of a report presented to the House, on the twenty ninth day of April last, from the committee appointed to inquire and report, whether moneys drawn from the Treasury have been faithfully applied to the objects for which they were appropriated; and whether the same have been regularly accounted for; and to report, likewise, whether any further arrangements are necessary to promote economy, enforce adherence to Legislative restrictions, and secure the accountability of persons entrusted with the public money," together with an appendix, comprising sundry explanatory statements in defence of the official conduct of the said James McHenry, whilst acting in the capacity aforesaid: the House proceeded in the reading of the said letter, and having made some progress therein,

Mr. ALSTON said that the paper which the Clerk was reading appeared to him to be a very voluminous one, and that he did not think the House were bound to listen to the reading of it. He conceived them only bound to attend to such documents as might be received from public officers, or to petitions for a redress of grievances. He did not believe the paper now before the House to be one of that description, or that the House ought to take any notice of it. If the House were bound to take notice of every letter any individual might think proper to write and address to the Speaker, very little time might be left to do any other business. He concluded by saying he thought they ought to take no more notice of it than they should of any paragraph in a newspaper which might be enclosed to the Speaker. He therefore moved that the paper should not be read.

Mr. STANLEY observed that he did not perceive the difference stated by his colleague; nor did he know how the gentleman could anticipate the contents of a communication before read. We shall be enabled to judge better of it when we hear it. By what inspiration could the gentleman form a judgment now? The communication appeared to him of the utmost importance. He hoped, therefore, it would be read.

Mr. MORRIS could not omit making a remark or two. From the communication, so far as read, it appeared that it was charged that the character of a former public officer had been aspersed. The House ought, therefore, not only to read the communication, but also to inquire into the complaint. There was not an indecent expression in it. The writer complains that his character has been attacked; he thinks unjustly attacked. It will be the height of injustice to refuse him an opportunity of being heard.

The SPEAKER said that it was a rule of the House that when the reading of a paper is called for, it shall be read, unless dispensed with by general consent.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he wished only to observe, that there was but one principle (and that had been stated by the Speaker) on which these papers ought to be read. Any member had a right to call for the reading of papers. To him, however, it appeared that there was no occasion for inspiration to perceive that the papers, so far as read, were in a high degree indecent, unworthy of any man who had held, or ought to hold, an office under Government, and derogatory from the dignity the House. Members were cited by name; insults were offered to individual members; a committee was divided into different sects; on one class illiberal calumnies were thrown, while the other class was shielded from reflection. Was this decent or indecent? He congratulated himself that he differed as widely on this subject as he did on others from gentlemen.

Mr. MORRIS said, however widely he might differ on this as well as other subjects from the gentleman from Virginia, he believed his own ideas of what was decent or indecent as correct as those of that gentleman. The letter states that a report had been made during the last session implicating the character of the writer. It further states that certain gentlemen on the committee did not concur in the report. This the writer knew from the debates upon the report. He therefore, thought it his duty, in vindicating himself, to exonerate those members from censure. Was this indecent? He conceived not.

Mr. M. said that when he had observed that there was not an indecent expression in the letter, he meant that there was no such expression applied to the House collectively. He did not mean to say there were no charges against individual members. But if there were charges against individual members, that was no reason for the House refusing to hear it. That could only be done when charges were made against the House in its collective character.

The SPEAKER read the rules of the House that applied to the case before them.

Mr. ALSTON said he only rose to notice the observation of his colleague, (Mr. STANLEY,) who supposed he saw the inside of the communication before it was presented. This he denied. He had grounded his motion exclusively on what he had heard read.

Mr. BACON was at a loss to decide on the propriety of reading or not reading these papers. He perceived that they contained not only a complaint, but a high charge against a committee of the House, stating that the major part assumed to act exclusively upon the business assigned to the whole committee, without consulting the other members. This was a high charge. Whether proper, or regularly made, he did not know. It was rather his opinion that the House ought to proceed in reading the papers, and afterwards to pass proper order on them.

The SPEAKER declared the rule for reading imperative, and Mr. ALSTON withdrew his motion; on which the Clerk proceeded in the reading, which was continued for more than an hour; when

H. OF R.

Case of John P. Van Ness—Amendment to Rules.

DECEMBER, 1802.

Mr. DAVIS renewed the motion for suspending the further reading. He asked what reason there was in consuming the time of the House in having long papers read, on which, when read, the House could not act? He read a rule of the House enjoining upon every member or the Speaker, before presenting any paper, briefly to state its contents; and asked of what avail this rule could be, unless it were in the power of the House to refuse the reading?

The SPEAKER again declared his opinion that the reading was imperative, unless dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. MITCHILL was proceeding to make some remarks, when Mr. GRISWOLD called him to order; as the decision of the SPEAKER had settled the point, unless an appeal was made therefrom.

Mr. DAVIS said he was so tired with the papers, and thought the precedent so bad a one, that he appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. DANA called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken, according to a rule, without debate, on the question "Is the decision of the Chair in order?"

Carried in the affirmative—yeas 62, nays 16, as follows:

The House then proceeded in the further reading of the said letter; and, having gone through the same, it was ordered that the said letter, with the appendix accompanying it, do lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, December 29.

Resolved. That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of granting further time to proprietors or holders of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered. That Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. CLAY, Mr. THATCHER, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. ISRAEL SMITH

be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. GRAY addressed the House in the following words:

Mr. SPEAKER: I rise to offer to the consideration of this honorable House a subject of an uncommon nature. In order that the crime of murder may no longer be deemed honorable, and with a view to mark with disgrace a wicked and pernicious practice, which has lately destroyed the social harmony of some of our fairest cities, and brought some of our most valuable citizens to an untimely end, I move the following resolution:

Mr. G. then offered a resolution for the appointment of a committee, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of disqualifying any person from holding an office under the Government of the United States, who shall hereafter be concerned in a duel, or in sending or carrying a challenge. Ordered to lie on the table.

CASE OF JOHN P. VAN NESS.

Mr. DAVIS called up his resolution instructing the Committee of Elections to inquire whether Mr. VAN NESS had not forfeited his seat, by accepting the appointment of Major in the Militia of the Territory of Columbia.

Mr. VAN NESS said that, so far as the decision of the House might affect him personally, he felt little concern; but, so far as it affected him as a representative of an important State, he was not so indifferent. He had no objection whatever to the proposed inquiry being made. As it involved the decision of an important principle, it deserved great attention. He had no doubt of the inquiry being made with that candor and fairness which, in most cases, characterized the proceedings of the House. He was far from imputing any impure motives to the mover or seconder of the resolution. It would be as derogatory in him to impute, as in them to entertain, any views dishonorable or base. He had risen barely to state his wish that an inquiry might be made.

Mr. ELMENDORF proposed a verbal amendment, which was not agreed to.

The resolution was then adopted without a division.

Mr. DAVIS said, that while on the subject of seats improperly held, he hoped another member would, by resigning, relieve the House from the necessity of deciding on his case. He questioned whether a Territorial delegate could represent a State. He alluded to the State of Ohio. It appeared to him that a State must be represented in a full manner, by representatives entitled as well to vote as to debate. The gentleman, therefore, who held his seat as the Representative of the Territory could not remain in that character after the Territory had become a State, inasmuch as he had been appointed under the Territorial Government. Mr. D. concluded by giving notice that, unless the gentleman resigned, he should offer a motion to vacate his seat.

AMENDMENT TO RULES.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that, on examining the rules of the House, he found two to which he wished to draw their attention. One in the following words: "When the reading of a paper is called for, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House." This rule had yesterday been decided (and in his opinion correctly) to apply to papers already in the possession of the House, and not to those which had never before been heard. But, sir, said Mr. R., I find another rule directing that all petitions, memorials, and other papers addressed to the House, shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place, and a brief statement of the contents thereof shall be verbally made by the introducers, &c. And wherefore? That the House may not be betrayed into the reading of that which it might be indecorous in them to hear. Conceiving, then, that they should be guided in the interpretation of their rules by the same principle which governed courts of justice in the construction of a law—"the adopting of such an interpretation as would give meaning and efficacy (if practicable) to every part of the instrument"—he had yesterday been compelled, however reluctantly, to differ from an authority eminently entitled to his respect. Since, whilst he concurred in the construction given to the rule which he had first read, he could not perceive that the right of the House to be put into possession of improper matter, was, thereby, at all affected. Otherwise, the provision contained in the second rule was rendered altogether nugatory.

DECEMBER, 1802.

Amendment to Rules.

H. OF R.

But since it had been adjudged that any communication, however voluminous; any petition, however frivolous; any memorial, however foreign to their jurisdiction; any paper, however it might insult the dignity, however it might derogate from the honor of the House, must, of necessity, be read; he conceived it his duty to endeavor to relieve the House from the embarrassment of being compelled to listen to a libel upon itself—to refuse which was, as he conceived, a right inherent in every deliberative assembly. He had drawn his proposed amendment in such terms as to leave untouched the sacred right of petition. A right which no one prized more dearly, and no one was more disposed to cherish and defend, than himself. This important privilege he believed would not be affected by the resolution which he was about to offer. Since, where redress of grievances was really sought, the petitioners had always the choice of inoffensive terms in which to express themselves, and nothing was more easily discernable than a petition whose object was the benefit of those preferring it, and one which was made a cover to insult those to whom it was preferred. He concluded with moving the following amendment to the rules of the House, to be inserted after that he had last read:

"That if any petition, memorial, or other paper, so presented, shall, in the opinion of any member, contain matter insulting to the dignity or derogatory from the honor of the House, the reading of such paper shall, if objected to, be determined by a vote of the House."

Mr. EUSTIS observed that, by the decision yesterday, it appeared that every paper presented to the House must be read. If that decision was correct, the House had tied itself down by its own rules and subjected itself to the necessity of hearing every paper offered, however long, or however improper.

Mr. E said it appeared to him necessary that this evil should be remedied. But he should not think it necessary to confine the power of exclusion to matter derogatory to the dignity of the House. There were other good causes for exclusion; the length of a paper; the manner of it being offensive, or the matter. It appeared to him a first principle that every paper offered was in the possession of the House, and might be read, or not. He had, therefore, wished the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia had been predicated upon a broader principle, viz: that if the reading of any paper should be objected to, the sense of the House should be taken. Suppose, said Mr. E., I present a petition containing one hundred and fifty pages. According to the rule, the reading of it cannot be dispensed with but by general consent; not even for other business of the greatest importance. Mr. E. then moved the following amendment of Mr. RANDOLPH's resolution:

"But if any petition, memorial, or other paper so presented, shall, in the reading, be objected to by any member, the further reading of the same shall be determined by a vote of the House."

A member inquired, whether, as the resolution and amendment went to rescind a standing rule of the House, it was in order to decide upon them the day on which they were offered.

The SPEAKER declared it was in order, as they did not go to rescind, but only to amend the standing rules.

The resolution and amendment were then taken up for consideration, when, on motion of Mr. VARNUM, they were referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. RANDOLPH, EUSTIS, and L. R. MORRIS.

THURSDAY, December 30.

Mr. MITCHILL moved a resolution for the appointment of a committee for inquiring into the expediency of amending and revising the several acts respecting patents and copyrights, to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Before offering the resolution, Mr. MITCHILL observed that his object was to simplify the existing statutes respecting patents, by comprising them in one act.

Resolution agreed to without a division.

FRIDAY, December 31.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the certificates or other credentials of several new members, and of the delegate from the Mississippi Territory, returned to serve in this House, made a report, in part, thereupon, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Treaty with Spain..

DECEMBER, 1802.

Washington, and of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House, and read, praying that Congress will pass an act for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington, to be styled "The Columbia General Insurance Company," to be established on such plan as shall suit the present circumstances and future prospects of the seat of Government of the United States.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. DENNIS, Mr. VAN NESS, and Mr. TALIAFERRO, that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GRAY called up his resolution, laid some time since on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law rendering all persons forever incapable of holding any office under the Government of the United States, who shall, at any time hereafter, be concerned in any duel, either in sending, carrying, or accepting any written or verbal challenge; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. DAVIS opposed the resolution. He said if the House could be made sensible that the resolution embraced a subject on which it could not constitutionally act, they would reject it. To him it was plain that if the House pursued the object of the resolution it led them on forbidden ground. In the first place it took from the citizens a right which, by their Constitution, they had secured to themselves, to wit: the right of free elections. Do what the resolution contemplates, and no man can hold a seat here who ever fought a duel, or gave or carried a challenge, although he may be the choice of the people. No such thing is said in the Constitution. The people in that instrument have already defined the disqualification to office—that charter of their rights declares that no person who has been impeached and found guilty "shall hold an office;" and I contend that Congress cannot impeach a person for any offence done by him as an individual; two things are requisite to ground an impeachment. First, the person must be an officer of the United States. Secondly, he must have been guilty of some malfeasance in the discharge of the duties imposed on him by that office. If an individual who does not hold an office under the United States commits murder, I deny the right of Congress to impeach him—he is made amenable to the State laws; while we were busy in impeaching the laws of the States. Let it not be understood that I advocate this practice. My observations disclaim the right we have to act on it.

The resolution was negatived.

TREATY WITH SPAIN.

A confidential Message, as also a letter addressed to the SPEAKER, were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

In addition to the information accompanying my message of the twenty-second instant, I now transmit the copy of the letter on the same subject, recently received.

Dec. 30, 1802.

TH. JEFFERSON.

WASHINGTON, December 30, 1802.

SIR: Although an informal communication to the public, of the substance of the enclosed letter, may be proper for quieting the public mind, yet I refer to the consideration of the House of Representatives, whether a publication of it, in form, might not give dissatisfaction to the writer, and tend to discourage the freedom and confidence of communications between the agents of the two Governments. Accept assurances of my high consideration and respect.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

The said Message and letter, and the papers transmitted therewith, were read: Whereupon, a motion was made and seconded that the same, together with the Message of the President of the United States, of the twenty-second instant, relative to "a violation on the part of Spain, of the twenty-second article of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits, and Navigation, between the United States and the King of Spain," and the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon to the House:

And the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 40, nays 42, as follows:

MONDAY, January 3, 1803.

Another member, to wit; PHILIP VAN CORTLANDT, from New York, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A petition of the Washington Building Company, signed by Daniel Brent, the chairman, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will pass a law to incorporate the said company under certain rules and regulations, intended by the petitioners for the improvement and ornament of the metropolis of the Union; and, also, that they may be enabled to extend the application of the funds of the said company to the insurance of buildings from fire.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. VAN NESS, Mr. GROVE, and Mr. CLAIBORNE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereon, to the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making a partial appropriation for the naval service during the year one thousand eight hundred and three; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims of the twenty-ninth ultimo, on the petition of Charles Hyde, presented the second of February, one thousand eight hundred and one; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the resolution contained therein with amendments; which were severally read and agreed to.

The said resolution as amended, being then twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House as follows:

Resolved, That the proper accounting officers liquidate and settle the account of Charles Hyde, for his services as judge advocate to the army, from the second day of December, Anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, to the fifteenth day of July, Anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, both inclusive; and that he be allowed such pay and emoluments for said services, as were at that time allowed by law, to the officers acting in that capacity.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A petition of Samuel Blodget was presented to the House, and read, praying relief, in the case of a judgment recovered against him in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, for property in the City of Washington, at the suit of the possessors of a prize ticket in a lottery authorized to be drawn for the improvement of the said city, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, and of which the petitioner was appointed an acting manager and superintendent.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed on the thirty-first ultimo, on the petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington and of Georgetown, relative to the incorporation of an insurance company in the said City of Washington; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting sundry documents respecting the claim of Peter Charles L'Enfant, for planning and laying out the City of Washington, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twenty fourth ultimo; which were read and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom is committed a report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of the said Peter Charles L'Enfant.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Charles Hyde, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House immediately.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into the said committee; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

A memorial of Daniel Lewis, of the county of West Chester, in the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, stating that the memorialist is, and for a long time has been, possessed of a medicine, which, in no case in which it has been administered, has failed of curing the bite of a mad dog, and totally removing the melancholy effects thereof; and praying that Congress will, in their wisdom, direct such inquiry into the repeated and successful trials made of the said medicine, as may fully convince them of the efficacy thereof; and, also, that on a discovery of the same, for the benefit of the people of the United States, the memorialist may be allowed such pecuniary compensation therefor, as may be deemed equitable and proper.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, Mr. ELMER, Mr. TENNEY, Mr. DICKSON, and Mr. ARCHER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to report to this House the situation of the timber deposited in the navy yards of the United States, for the purpose of building ships-of-war; and whether, in order to preserve the same, it should be covered with sheds.

A petition of Josiah Fox, and others, inhabitants of the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, stating that the petitioners consider the act of Congress, (commonly called the Bankrupt law,) passed on the fourth day of April, one thousand eight hundred, as requiring Legislative correction; the same being, as they conceive, partial and injurious in its operation; and praying that Congress will take the premises into consideration, and provide such remedies for the evils complained of, as to their wisdom may seem most proper.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. NEWTON, Mr. TALLMADGE, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. HUNT, Mr. MITCHILL, Mr. LOWNDES, and Mr.

VARNUM; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Resolved, That the committee to whom was this day referred a petition of sundry inhabitants of the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, be instructed to consider the expediency of repealing an act, entitled "An act to establish an uniform system of Bankruptcy throughout the United States," and report their opinion thereon to the House.

Mr. LEIB observed that, during the last session, a proposition had been made, and had passed this House, to amend the Constitution respecting the election of President and Vice President, but which had been rejected in the Senate. Mr. L. said that the citizens he represented were extremely anxious on this subject. He therefore considered it his duty to submit a similar proposition, in order to determine whether it would not share a better fate. He then proposed an amendment, substantially, that in all future elections of President and Vice President, the persons voted for shall be particularly designated by declaring which are voted for as President, and which as Vice President.

Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill "for the relief of insolvent debtors in the District of Columbia."

The blank in the fourth line of the first section fixes the period of residence in the District required to entitle a debtor to the benefit of the act. This, on motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, was filled with "one year."

Several other amendments were made in the different sections, on the motion of Mr. NICHOLSON. The most material of which provided for the liberation of a confined debtor, during the vacation of the court, by two or more justices.

The Committee proceeded to the third section, which is as follows:

"SEC. 3. And be it enacted, That, upon the petitioning debtor's executing a deed to the said trustee, conveying all his property, real, personal, and mixed, and all his claims, rights, and credits, agreeably to the oath or affirmation of the said debtor, and on the delivery of all his said property which he shall have in his possession, and his books, papers, and evidence of debts of every kind to the said trustee; and, upon the said trustee's certifying the same to the court, in writing, it shall be lawful for the court to order that the said petitioning debtor shall be discharged from all debts, covenants, promises, and agreements, due from or owing or contracted by him prior to the date of the said deed, and by virtue of such order the said debtor shall be discharged as aforesaid: Provided, That no person who has been guilty of a breach of the laws, and who has been fined or imprisoned for such breach shall be discharged from the payment of such fine, or from his imprisonment: And provided, likewise, That any property which the debtor may afterwards acquire by gift, descent, or in his own right, by bequest, devise, or in any course of distribution, shall be liable to the payment of the said debts, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that, by the provisions of this section, the bankrupt system was put in force not only as to the merchants, but as to every description of citizens. It extended to all persons who might migrate to this sanctuary. It operated in the nature of a repealing law to the laws of all the States. It would also have the operation of an ex post facto law. If these objections should not be answered, he would be compelled to give his vote against the bill.

Mr. DAVIS thought the third section liable to the objections of the gentleman from Virginia. It extended the benefit of the bankrupt system to the people of this Territory in a manner different from that which was extended to the citizens of the States. As, however, the subject did not appear to have been much reflected on, he moved that the Committee should rise, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he should make at that time but little comment on the remarks of gentlemen opposed to the provisions of the third section. The principle involved in the third section was certainly a very important one. It would be well, he thought, for the Committee to express their sense of it before they rose; to decide whether it should be retained or not. If not retained, the bill would require considerable modification. He would, therefore, make a few observations on the principle of the section, in the hope that the gentleman from Kentucky would vary his motion, and move, in lieu thereof, to strike out the third section, in order to try the sense of the House.

Gentlemen were mistaken, when they considered this section as extending to the citizens of this Territory the benefits of the bankrupt system. If they had been so extended, he could not see any solid objection to it. But the provisions were very different. By the bankrupt law, when the certificate is granted, the bankrupt is discharged from all his debts. By this section he is not discharged, because it is provided that any property afterward acquired "by gift, descent, devise, or in any course of distribution," shall be liable for his debts. Under the insolvent laws of Virginia and Kentucky, an insolvent debtor's property is answerable after his liberation. In other States, a different principle prevails.

Mr. N. said, the principle of the bill was an equitable principle. For if, after an insolvent debtor shall be liberated from confinement, and shall assign over all his existing property, property afterwards acquired by his own personal industry shall be answerable for his debts, you destroy all stimulus to exertion and labor. The evil, too, is not merely personal to him, but is felt by society at large, because his industry not only contributes to his own personal benefit, but to that also of society. You lose, therefore, a valuable member of society. This is not the only loss. You likewise inflict an essential injury on his family, that are under his special protection.

effects of this rigor on two descriptions of citizens in this place; those who kept boarding-houses and store-keepers.]

He concluded by observing that, in his opinion, the bankrupt law went too far, while the laws of Virginia and Kentucky did not go far enough. While property acquired by the personal labor of a debtor ought not to be answerable for his previous debts, he was of opinion that property, otherwise acquired, should be answerable.

Mr. DAVIS withdrew his motion for the rising of the Committee, and moved to strike out the words "all debts, covenants, promises, and agreements, due for or owing, or contracted by him prior to the date of the said deed," and to insert in lieu thereof "imprisonment."

Mr. D. begged leave to offer a few remarks on what had fallen from the gentleman from Maryland. That gentleman had remarked that, to make property afterward acquired by the personal exertion of the debtor answerable, would destroy a great stimulus to industry, while he considered it perfectly right that property acquired by descent or gift should be made answerable. Now, is anything more easy than to evade this provision? If an individual is known to be bankrupt, he presumed none of his friends would give him anything, because it would be applied to the payment of his debts. They will be sure to vest it in some friends for his use, and thus preclude the ability of the creditor to touch it. The argument of the gentleman, therefore, was not correct. Mr. D. said, if this section should be struck out, the same provisions would apply to this District as applied to the States.

Mr. RANDOLPH was against the section. He was not, however, surprised at the support it received from his friend (Mr. NICHOLSON) from his known humanity, and from the partiality which it was natural he should entertain for the municipal regulations of his own State. But he would, on further reflection, find that, by extending thus far the measure of his humanity to the debtor, he will essentially injure the creditor. Mr. R. knew how easy it was to work on the passions of a deliberative body by portraying the miseries of the unfortunate. For himself, he abhorred the incarceration of the body for debt. But he was for taking a middle course between the extreme rigor of our ancestors, and the unjust clemency to the debtor proposed by this section. He would ask, by what description of persons the greatest injury had been inflicted on society in this country; whether by debtors, under the iron grasp of their creditors, or by debtors whom the mistaken clemency of the law had permitted to ruin their creditors? He believed that a more extensive scene of injury had been inflicted on the country by the villany, (he could call it by no other name,) of men who had sported with the property of others, than had been inflicted by the most merciless rigor of creditors.

By denying to the creditor the power of incarcerating the body of his debtor, you proceed as far as justice will warrant. Farther you cannot go; because the obligation to comply with contracts is eternal, and not subject to your regulations. He would say that, if the debtor were an honest man, he would make good his engagements, whatever the law might say to the contrary. With regard to a want of stimulus to industry, which the gentleman from Maryland had assigned as a reason for retaining the section, he would ask if there was no danger to be apprehended from a law which put it in the power of any man, by twelve months' residence here, to elude all claims against him? Which most conduced to the public benefit, the exertions of an honest and laborious man, or those you may expect from an insolvent debtor? It is right to respect the miseries of the unfortunate. But these distresses are, in more instances, the effects of crime than of misfortune.

Mr. RANDOLPH considered the ideas of the gentleman from Kentucky as going as far as they should go. They say, you shall not torture the person of a debtor; but you shall not absolve him, on his simple oath, from his obligations. Can you dispense a man from his just engagement? They are about to apply that dispensing power, which, in religious cases, has proved so injurious, and, like the Pope of old, free individuals from engagements as strong as the matrimonial bond, and other obligations. Have they not the same right to do the one as the other? Is it not as cruel to take away the money of the creditor as that of the debtor? Is it not known that creditors, to an immense amount, are starving? Mr. R. believed their sufferings were greater than those of debtors. What had become of the millions spunged by the bankrupt system? They had gone, with the wild systems and projects to which they had given rise. As to the debtor, having performed a complete revolution, he stands where he stood before. He began with nothing, and with nothing has ended.

Suppose there should be a collision between your act and that of the States, under each of which there shall be an assignment; which is to give way? Mr. R. concluded by saying that the least important consideration to him, though it might be important to others, was that, in case the section was agreed to, this place would become the resort of debtors of all descriptions. It would become the temple of Mecca.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he might be partial to this provision, inasmuch as it had existed in the State he represented, ever since the year 1774. He did not know, notwithstanding, that the State of Maryland had been turned into a temple of Mecca, nor were people in the habit of flocking to it. Why then flock here rather than to Maryland? The section requires twelve months residence before a debtor shall be entitled to the benefits of the provision. If that term is insufficient, increase it. Say, that it shall extend to two or three years, or a greater period. To this he might have no objection. But he cherished the principle, because he deemed it valuable.

What are the objections urged against it? It is said that its intention may be evaded. This is true. It may be evaded. But he would ask if it could be so changed as to prevent this evil? Suppose all the property of the debtor shall be answerable for his debts. Will not a fraudulent debtor say to the person disposed to leave him anything, vest it in my children, my wife, or friends; and will not that be as complete a fraud upon the creditors as that which gentlemen have described? This can be prevented by no law whatever.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he would ask what would be the effect upon a man who has a family of children dependent upon him? Would he exert himself to acquire property when he did not know that he could retain it an hour after the acquisition? He asked if this was in the nature of man? As far as his observation extended it was not. Although there were some lenient creditors, there were others that were relentless, and who would lay their talons on the first fruits of his labors. Will not this destroy industry? But gentlemen say this provision will effect a moral injury to the creditor. True; but what do they say to the effects of the contrary provision on the debtor? They will liberate him from jail, that he may become a vagrant, without any inducement to industry, or to employ with effect the powers of his mind. He would ask if this last moral injury was not the greater? For his part he believed this provision would have a great and good effect. It would prevent the injurious extension of credit. It would, in this place, repress speculation in lots, by reducing property to its real value, which would contribute to the improvement of the city, and enable persons, by obtaining ground on moderate terms, to come here to build.

A similar provision has existed in Maryland for twenty-six years. The law there extends to all debtors who do not owe more than two hundred pounds sterling. In other cases it is usual for the Legislature to pass an annual law on the petition of debtors. If they pursue a similar course, all their time would be occupied to the neglect of business of infinitely greater importance. It became, therefore, necessary to pass a general law on the subject, in doing which no essential injury could be done the creditor, while an essential service would be conferred on the debtor.

Mr. GODDARD was opposed to the section, for reasons additional to those offered by the gentlemen from Virginia and Kentucky. This provision appeared to him to extend much further than those of the bankrupt law. By this bill the debtor is to present to the court a list of his creditors, who are to choose a trustee to whom all his property is to be assigned, and he is to be liberated, on doing this, without their consent. This was not the principle of the bankrupt act, under which a bankrupt could not be discharged but by the concurrence of two-thirds of the creditors both in value and number. How easy it would be under this bill for a debtor to render a list of his friends only, and by getting them to appoint an assignee according to his wishes, fraudulently to rob his creditors! The bill was of such a nature as to operate not alone in the District of Columbia, but upon creditors dispersed throughout the Union. The bankrupt law, notwithstanding all its checks, had given rise to many frauds. How much more extensive, therefore, would the frauds be under this bill, where all these checks were removed?

Mr. NICHOLSON replied to the observations of Mr. GODDARD, by remarking that it was entirely left to the discretion of the court to give such notice to the creditors as they saw fit, who might come in at the time, or within two years, and on showing fraud, deny all the benefit of the act to the debtor, who might be punished for perjury. He agreed with the gentleman that under the bankrupt law many frauds had been committed. This was inevitable. He had been no advocate for that law, nor one of those who passed it. But as most of the States have some provisions on this subject, he thought this district, viewing it as a State, ought to have similar provisions extended to it.

Mr. MITCHILL said he could not agree to the amendment, as he did not view the original principle of the bill with that abhorrence that had been expressed by some gentlemen. He had always considered it as a paradox that in countries, comparatively free, the love of property should predominate over that of freedom. Having seen this principle once resorted to, it afterwards appeared to be acted upon as a matter of course. He could not, however, but reflect on the time of our Saxon ancestors, considering us as having derived our origin from England, when no deprivation of personal liberty was allowed for debt. By them it was provided that the freedom of the person should never be infringed but in cases which concerned the breaking of the peace or for offences against the organization of the realm. These rights had been confirmed under Edward the Confessor, and again adopted as part of Magna Charta, [the words of which Mr. MITCHILL here quoted.] And yet the Legislature of that country had acted in direct violation of this stipulation. This, however, was, he believed, easily to be traced to a spirit of commerce; that aura sacra fames, which made them ready, with one accord, to commute money for liberty. Tracing the subject from its first stage, the Legislature of that country, and we in imitation, had soon proceeded from the process of arresting the person to the period of ultimate confinement, in a series of violations of the great principles of Magna Charta, until it became necessary for the Legislature to interfere to remove the evils consequent upon their measures, first to emancipate the person of the debtor from a species of slavery, and secondly to emancipate him from his debts.

Mr. MITCHILL said he had been thus particular in his reference to England, because what had been adopted there applied mutatis mutandis to this country.

[He then went into a detailed specification of his reasons for the original principle of the bill, which we regret our inability to report from the occasional lowness of his voice breaking the chain of his ideas as communicated to us, concluding with an expression of the opinion, that one year's residence was too short; and that if it should be determined to retain the section, he would propose a longer period.]

Mr. MACON (Speaker) was in favor of the committee rising, as he did not think they were prepared for a decision. Notwithstanding all that had been said, Congress ought not lightly to violate contracts between individuals. Most of the States had insolvent laws; and their various ideas on this subject might perhaps be taken from the systems of the different States in which they lived. As to himself, he believed that no government ought to let any man keep property that belonged of right to another. Suppose a man, an insolvent debtor, should ride in his carriage, while his creditors should be begging bread in the streets. Did not this show the necessity of caution? All that could be justly asked was to liberate the person of the debtor. There was no great danger of the rigor of the creditor. It was not the practice of Americans to seize from a man what was necessary for his family.

Mr. M. entertained doubts whether Congress in legislating for this District could affect property that lay in the several States. Suppose, for instance, that a debtor execute a deed for property in an extreme State; while in that State the same property is sold under execution on a suit instituted there. Which would be valid?

This provision appeared to him to place the people of this Territory in a very different situation from the citizens in the several States. In other cases Congress legislate generally; here, exclusively. One State cannot pass a law that shall affect the property in another State. If Congress undertake to pass a law that shall affect all property, there may be endless confusion and clashing of jurisdiction. He concluded by moving that the Committee should rise, and ask leave to sit again.

Carried without a division; and leave granted.

Mr. NEWTON presented a petition from sundry inhabitants of Norfolk and Portsmouth, praying that the bankrupt law may be amended. Referred to a select committee of seven.

Mr. VARNUM moved that the same committee should be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the bankrupt law.

Mr. NEWTON considered the committee already raised as competent to the inquiry, without any express instruction.

Mr. GRISWOLD thought this motion incompatible with the prayer of the petition from Norfolk and Portsmouth—the one being in favor of an amendment, and the other in favor of a repeal of the bankrupt act. After it shall appear that it is not susceptible of amendment, it may be proper to agitate the question of repeal.

Mr. VARNUM thought there was no impropriety in submitting both propositions to the same Committee, who will inquire into the merits of the law, and the propriety of continuing it. It appeared to him that it was not calculated to protect the happiness of the citizens of the United States. It opened the door to the greatest frauds and inequalities imaginable. He hoped the subject would be taken up seriously, and expressed his opinion that the law was considered by both political sides as injurious

Mr. GRISWOLD replied, and insisted that the arguments of the gentleman proved the impropriety of referring both points to the same committee. If the gentleman is against a continuance of the law, let it be referred to a Committee of the Whole, who will be the most proper organ for expressing the sense of the House on that principle.

The question was then taken on Mr. VARNUM's motion; which was carried—ayes 45, noes 25.

TUESDAY, January 4.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Charles Hyde was read the third time, and passed.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for erecting a monument to the memory of General Herkemer, pursuant to a resolution of Congress, passed the fourth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven.

Ordered, That Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. STRATTON, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement exhibiting the amount of duties and drawbacks on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and exported therefrom, during the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine, one thousand eight hundred, and one thousand eight hundred and one; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill making a partial appropriation for the naval service, during the year one thousand eight hundred and three; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported to the House without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported, with several amendments thereto, which were twice read, and, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the establishment of post roads throughout the United States.

Resolved, That whatever money shall be received in the Treasury of the United States from the Post Office, shall, after defraying the expenses of that establishment, be appropriated to fixing and improving the post roads.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

A petition of Matthew Patterson and others, inhabitants and settlers on French Broad river, and within the original chartered boundaries of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, stating certain inconveniences to which the petitioners are, and will be, subjected, in consequence of that portion of territory in which they reside, being considered as a part of the State of Georgia, and praying that the said portion of territory may be annexed to, and comprehended within the State of South Carolina, for the reasons therein specified.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. MOORE, Mr. DICKSON, and Mr. PERKINS, that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. JOHN C. SMITH in the Chair, on the bill for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia.

Mr. NICHOLSON said that, when this section was under consideration yesterday, a number of gentlemen had declared themselves decidedly against the principle of it. He therefore moved to strike out the section, though he should vote against it.

On this motion the question was immediately taken, and carried in the affirmative by a large majority—ayes 50.

When, on motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the Committee rose, the House refused their permission to sit again, and recommitted the bill to the committee who introduced it.

CESSION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. GRISWOLD observed, that there was one subject noticed in the President's Message, on which the House had taken no order. It was very important that the Legislature should possess all the information that it was in the power of the Heads of Departments to furnish. He then read that part of the Message that relates to the cession of Louisiana to the French; and said that, for the purpose of obtaining all the information proper at that time to be given, he made the following motion:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this House copies of such official documents as have been received by this Government, announcing the cession of Louisiana to France, together with a report explaining the stipulations, circumstances, and conditions, under which that Province is to be delivered up; unless such documents and report will, in the opinion of the President, divulge to the House particular transactions not proper at this time to be communicated."

Mr. GRISWOLD considered it respectful to save the President from a request to furnish papers that may be improper at this time. The subject, however, was vastly important, and the cession of the Province might require from the Legislature some further protection of that frontier.

Mr. SMILE hoped the resolution would lie on the table at least till to-morrow.

Mr. S. SMITH asked the gentleman from Connecticut to explain the difference between his resolution, and that offered at the beginning of the session by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.)

Mr. GRISWOLD replied that, if the gentleman from Maryland would give himself the trouble of reading the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, he would perceive the difference. That related to the shutting of the port of New Orleans by Spain; and the other to the cession of the Province to France. If the gentleman thought there were any delicate subjects connected with the resolution, he had no objection to its resting until to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 5.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives :

Agreeably to the request of the House of Representatives, I now transmit a statement of the militia of those States from which any returns have been made to the War Office. They are, as you will perceive, but a small proportion of the whole. I send you, also, the copy of a circular letter, written some time since, for the purpose of obtaining returns from all the States: should any others, in consequence of this, be made during the session of Congress, they shall be immediately communicated.

TH. JEFFERSON.

JANUARY 5, 1803.

The said Message was read, and, together with the papers referred to therein, ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on the seven-teenth ultimo, to whom was referred "so much of the President's Message as relates to the militia institution of the United States."

An engrossed bill making a partial appropriation for the Naval service during the year one thousand eight hundred and three, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred, on the fourteenth ultimo, a bill for the relief of Henry Messonnier, together with the memorial of the said Henry Messonnier, with the vouchers accompanying the same, presented the third day of February, and a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures thereon, of the 8th of March last, made a report; which was read.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Henry Messonnier; which was read the first time.

A motion was made, that the said bill be now read the second time; which being objected to, on the ground that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were not authorized by any resolution or order of the House, during the present session, to report by way of bill or bills, or otherwise: and debate arising thereon, another motion was made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be authorized to report by bill or bills, or otherwise, on all such matters as shall, from time to time, be referred to them by the House.

And the question being taken thereupon it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the said committee have leave to withdraw from the Clerk's table their report and the other papers relative to the claim of Henry Messonnier.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the city and county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House, and read, praying that Congress will pass a law authorizing a new road to be opened, at the expense of the said county, connecting the Northern end of West Fourteenth street, in the city of Washington, with the public road leading from Rock Creek church to Georgetown, for the convenience and benefit of the petitioners and other inhabitants within the said District.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee appointed on the twenty-first ultimo, on a memorial of the first and second branches of the City Council of Washington.

CESSION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. GRISWOLD called up his resolution respecting Louisiana, laid on the table yesterday, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this House copies of such official documents as have been received by this Government, announcing the cession of Louisiana to France, together with a report explaining the stipulations, circumstances, and conditions, under which that province is to be delivered up; unless such documents and report will, in the opinion of the President, divulge to the House particular transactions not proper at this time to be communicated.

The question was put on taking it into consideration, and carried—yeas 35, nays 32.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that the discussion on this motion might embrace points nearly connected with the subject referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and which had been discussed with closed doors. He therefore thought it would be expedient to commit this motion also to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to whom had been committed the Message of the President respecting New Orleans.

Mr. RANDOLPH accordingly made such motion.

Mr. GRISWOLD only rose to make a question of order, viz: whether the gentleman could move the reference of the resolution to a Committee of the Whole on a subject whose discussion required closed doors.

Mr. SPEAKER said the motion was to refer the resolution to a Committee on the Union generally; there was no special Committee on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he made no question of order of that. He had no doubt it was in order.

The SPEAKER decided the motion to be in order.

Mr. GRISWOLD hoped the motion would not prevail. He did not see what argument could be urged in favor of it. The resolution related to a public transaction stated on their Journal. He did not think that anything which ought to be kept secret could be involved in the discussion of it. What is its purport? It only requests the President to furnish documents respecting "the cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France, which took place in the course of the late war," and which the President says "will, if carried into effect, make a change in the aspect of our foreign relations, which will doubtless have just weight in any deliberations of the Legislature connected with this subject."

Are not, said Mr. G., these papers important to the House? Does not the President refer to them as important to enlighten us? He speaks of the cession as a fact. He took it for granted the President would not make the declaration unless he had official information of its truth. Ought not the House to be possessed of all the important information in the power of the Executive to give? It certainly ought. Every gentleman would agree that the House ought to have all the information. If the information is confidential, it will be received with closed doors. But the question, whether the House shall obtain this information is a public question; and there was not a man within those walls, or in the United States, who would not say that the Legislature ought to possess every information on a subject so deeply interesting. Why, then, refer this resolution calling for information to a committee? Why postpone it? They had but a short time to sit. More than half the session was already elapsed. Is it not time to gain information? Mr. G. said, he would venture to declare that no subject so important could be brought before the Legislature this session. Ought we not, therefore, on such a subject, to take immediate means to gain information? He hoped the House would not agree to the reference, which could have no effect but to put the resolution asleep, and deprive the Legislature of information they ought to possess.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, as he had expressed his disinclination to discuss a proposition with open doors which would trench on the decision of the House to discuss a subject to which it intimately related with closed doors, it could scarcely be expected that he should indulge the gentleman in entering into arguments calculated to carry him from his purpose. But he denied that the adoption of his motion would be a refusal to give information. He well knew that there was nothing easier than to declare the subject vastly important, and to make an eloquent harangue upon it, and to infer that those who did not immediately agree to the resolution were averse to giving information, and to going into a discussion of the merits of the main subject. It would, however, not be expected that he should enter upon these on a preliminary resolution. But he would assure the gentleman who had submitted this resolution, that, so far from indulging any disposition to be dilatory in his attention to this important subject, he came yesterday prepared to make a motion that the House should go into a Committee of the Whole on the subject, which motion he should have then made but for that offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said that, did he consider that the giving publicity to any information on this subject would in the least interfere with the Constitutional functions of the President, he would be the last man to support the resolution of his friend from Connecticut. But he could not conceive that this could be its effect. What were they about to ask? They were about to ask, in respectful terms, the President for information relative to what he states as a fact; so much information as he may think it expedient to give. Surely there would be no impropriety in this. The cession of Louisiana had been stated in all the public prints of Europe and this country, and on the floor of the British Parliament. This cession had been made a year ago, and, notwithstanding the elapse of this time, we have received no official information on this subject. Is it not natural for the people to ask why Congress do not call for this information? Will they not say the President has done his duty in stating the fact? Upon this subject, so very important, are they to be kept in the dark? Mr. R. could not conceive any turn of the debate on this resolution that could produce a discussion of the merits of the Message referred to the Committee of the Whole. If the President shall say the information he gives us ought not to be made public, he would answer for himself, and he believed he could answer for his friends, that they would not seek a public discussion. And if the information is imparted without confidence, the House, if it see fit, can itself control a public discussion. Mr. R. concluded with saying that, in the present case, he was for deciding on the resolution with open doors.

Mr. S. SMITH thought this point ought in a great measure to be determined by the custom of the House in similar cases. He did not assert it as a fact, but, from recollection, he believed it was so, that when a call was made for papers in the case of the British Treaty, the question was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and there fully discussed. According to his recollection, one side of the House called for papers on the principle that, after negotiations were terminated, the House had a right to information before they made a grant of money under a treaty, but acknowledging that a call for such information might be improper during a pending negotiation. He was one of those who thought it proper, on that occasion, that the House should have the papers; but he also thought it improper, and had then so declared, to call for papers during a pending negotiation. Whether in the present instance a negotiation was pending or was not, he did not know. He was, therefore, for postponing the resolution till this was known to the House.

Mr. DANA said that he did not know, nor had he heard from any quarter, that there was any negotiation depending respecting the cession of Louisiana. The President has informed us of the fact. All that the resolution asks are official documents respecting the cession, with the stipulations, circumstances, and conditions, under which it is to be delivered up. He could not see the impropriety of such a request. But if the President deem it improper to furnish the information, we do not assert our right to demand it. There are two views in which this information may be important; that which may throw light on the boundaries of the province as ceded; and another, whether the province is to be ceded to the French in the condition it shall be in when actually delivered up, or whether subject to the conditions in which it was held according to treaty by Spain. This is important information to guide our deliberations; information not depending upon an existing negotiation, but upon a negotiation decided.

Mr. GRISWOLD called for the taking of the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMILIE was in favor of the widest publicity in every case where it would not prove injurious; and there were, in his opinion, very few cases in which it ought not to take place. He could not, however, withhold one remark; that gentlemen should object to the mode now proposed, a mode similar to that adopted in like cases, greatly surprised him. [He here quoted the proceedings of the House on a call for papers in the case of the British Treaty.] That case furnished a precedent, by which it appeared that a motion for information was referred to a Committee of the Whole for a more full discussion.

Mr. DAVIS observed that, as he lived in that district of county most materially affected by the subject before the House, he thought it proper to express his opinion on the motion. He said he did not know what reason could be assigned for the motion, but that expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, to go into a Committee of the Whole in private, to propose certain resolutions that required secrecy.

Mr. D. said it had been his purpose yesterday to have submitted certain resolutions, which he should have done, but for the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut calling for information; after it was made he was willing to wait until all information was obtained that could be furnished. Suppose we go into a Committee of the Whole, what light can we expect from their deliberation? We can gain nothing. But let the call for information prevail; let us draw from the President such information as he may think it proper to give; and let us then refer that information to a Committee of the Whole, and they will be able to deliberate wisely. *What use can it be to take a step from which no benefit can be derived? As to the call on the President, he will not give us anything that is improper. How does the gentleman from Virginia know what light this information may throw on the subject? Is he prepared to say it will throw no light on this subject? If he is, Mr. D. said he himself was not. He might have ways of acquiring the secrets of the Cabinet; but for himself he had no such opportunities. Mr. D. concluded by declaring himself against the motion.

Mr. RANDOLPH was compelled again reluctantly to trespass on the indulgence of the House, to assure them, and the gentleman from Kentucky, that his motion did not comprehend a refusal to agree to the call for information made by the gentleman from Connecticut. After going into committee, they might, perhaps, either by a unanimous vote, or by that of a majority, agree to the resolution. Benefit might arise, and no mischief possibly could, from going into a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUGER must acknowledge that he could not understand the object of those who were for refusing this information. If they had any objection to asking the information, let them inform us what it is. And if they have no objection, why go into a Committee of the Whole; which if gone into, must be with closed doors? The question alluded to in the British Treaty was very different from this. In that case, one part of the House thought they had a right to demand the information of the Executive, and that he was bound to deliver it; while the other part of the House neither acknowledged the right to demand, nor the obligation to obey. The present case was entirely different. We ask nothing but what the Executive shall think proper to furnish, we are as cautious as we can possibly be; we even go so far as to put words in the President's mouth, if he shall think there is any impropriety in giving the information. Gentlemen certainly have confidence in the Executive, that he will tell us if the information is improper to be furnished.

Mr. H. could not but express his surprise that the House had received no official documents on this important subject. He could not comprehend why Congress should not know the contents of the convention. If proper, we ought to have these documents; and if not proper, we ought to have a reason for it. The country was in a state of serious alarm; and it might have a bad effect if something was not immediately done, and a disposition exhibited to act, in case it should prove necessary.

Mr. SMILIE said the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HUGER) was incorrect, when he stated that, in the case of the British Treaty, one set of gentlemen had contended for the right of the House to demand papers. If this had been so, the resolution then proposed would have been peremptory; whereas the fact was that it was qualified by an exception of such papers as the President might consider it improper to furnish. [Mr. SMILIE here quoted the Journals, which confirmed his remark.]

Mr. GREGG, said it would be allowed that this was an important resolution, which related to an important subject. This was, he believed, the first instance in which a resolution allowed to be important, had been refused a reference to a Committee of the Whole. On this principle his vote would be decided. If the motion did not prevail he should then move that the resolution should be printed before it was acted upon.

Mr. GRISWOLD would not object to the reference if the object were to obtain a more full discussion of the resolution. He was generally in favor of such references, as the discussion was conducted in a Committee of the Whole on a freer scale than in the House. On this principle it was, that the call for papers respecting the British Treaty was referred to a Committee of the Whole. But it had not been referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

H. OF R.

Cession of Louisiana to France.

He, however, understood the object of gentlemen to be to refer the resolution to a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of discussing it with closed doors. If that were the object, he should oppose it. For, he would say, nothing of secrecy could arise out of the discussion of this resolution. He did not wish that a resolution so important should be referred to a secret committee. If gentlemen mean to deny us this information, let them deny it in public. Let them not do it in a secret committee. Surely they can have no such unworthy motives.

As to the case of 1796, under the British Treaty, the ground of opposition was this: It was claimed that the House had a right to decide upon a treaty, and to establish this point papers were called for. And on the decision of the question, on the granting or refusing the application, depended the establishment of the right of the House to participate in the treaty-making power. This right was denied by those who voted against the call. But in this case there was no difference as to the power of the House. The President in his Message had expressly stated that the cession would have weight in the deliberations of the Legislature. This, then, being a case in which it is proper to legislate, shall we go to work blindfold, without having all the information possessed by the Executive, that it is proper we should possess? What do we know respecting the cession? Though made for more than one year, we have no information, except that contained in the Message, which barely mentions the fact. For these reasons Mr. G. hoped the motion would not prevail, as its avowed object was not for a more full discussion, but for the purpose of going into a secret committee. If gentlemen mean to deny us the information we ask, let the denial be public; and if they grant it, there is no reason against their doing it publicly.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—The gentleman from Connecticut tells us that this subject is referred to in the Message of the President, and that on it we are called by him to legislate. That subject has been referred to a Committee of the Whole; and yet, he says, it is improper to refer this resolution to the same committee. This may be logic; but I confess, if it is, I do not understand it. He says if the object of reference be for a more ample discussion, he will be in favor of it; but not so, if it be to send it to a secret committee. Does the gentlemen mean to insinuate that the debates of this body are for the entertainment of the ladies who honor us with their presence; or that as soon as our doors are shut, our ears also are shut to all useful and necessary information? If the doors shall be closed, cannot we still agree to the resolution? However gentlemen may persist in the course they have taken, I shall not permit the warmth of their remarks, or that of my own feelings, to betray me into a debate on points which the House have determined shall be discussed with closed doors. For my own part, I am ready to declare that I have arguments to advance, that it is not my wish to advance with open doors.

Mr. BACON said the resolution simply called for information respecting the cession of the province of Louisiana to the French. He did not see the end to be answered by committing it. Is there any doubt that we shall not stand in need of information when we come to discuss points connected with this subject? It appeared to him they would. He was therefore against the reference.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The gentleman from Connecticut has candidly admitted that it is customary in such cases to make a reference; that he is not in favor of the reference being made to a committee with shut doors; but if the object were to obtain a free discussion, he would not object to it. He is told that a full and free discussion cannot be had without such a reference, and yet he persists in his hostility to the motion. He had been told so by the mover, and common sense would have told him so at first; yet he is for taking advantage of the mover, and for shutting out the arguments he has to urge. The gentleman is mistaken in his statement of the motives of the different sides of the House in the discussion on a call for papers, in 1796, when he represents one side as claiming a right to participate in the treaty-making power. He recollected it had been charged upon them; but they had denied it. We contended, said Mr. S., that when a treaty was formed, appropriating a large sum of money, we had a right to appropriate or not to appropriate the money; but we never assumed the right to say whether the treaty was concluded or not. Afterwards, gentlemen themselves, if he recollected right, moved a resolution that it was expedient to carry the treaty into effect, by which they did admit the right of the House. Mr. S. said he had no previous knowledge of what the gentleman from Virginia meant by his motion; he might perhaps wish to amend the resolution; but when he says he has arguments that he cannot urge without shut doors, he trusted that indulgence would be allowed him, or there would be a denial of justice.

Mr. DANA said, there was a magic of language, to those unaccustomed to parliamentary language, in the House resolving itself into a committee, and that committee returning itself back into the House, both composed of the same members, that made the proceedings of public bodies appear ridiculous. But there were substantial benefits derived from the observance of these forms. There was a fuller and freer discussion; every member spoke as often as he chose, and they enjoyed the Speaker's advice. There were, besides, two discussions and decisions, instead of one. He admitted, therefore, the propriety of such procedure in all cases where there was an important principle involved. But in this instance there was no important principle to discuss. There was an important principle involved in the famous question of 1796. It was therefore right to refer it to a Committee of the Whole. He did not know what principle was to be discussed on this reference, unless it was the want of information. This he most sensibly felt ; and those gentlemen who also felt it, might, he thought, be indulged by those who possess all information on the subject. If any gentleman, however, will say that any important principle is involved in the resolution, he was ready to go into Committee of the Whole, though not with closed doors.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion, to refer the resolution of Mr. GRISWOLD to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and carried—yeas 49, nays 39, as follows:

NAYS—John Bacon, Phaniel Bishop, Thos. Boude, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, John Dennis, Wm. Dickson, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, William Helms, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, Benjamin Huger, Samuel Hunt, Thomas Lowndes, Ebenezer Mattoon, Lewis R. Tillinghast, George B. Upham, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

On motion of Mr. GRISWOLD, the House immediately went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and observed that he held in his hands certain resolutions connected with the Message of the PRESIDENT, relative to the late proceedings at New Orleans, the discussion of which had been ordered to be carried on with closed doors. He asked the decision of the question, whether, previously to offering his resolutions, the doors ought not to be closed? The resolutions he meant to submit grew out of the Message. If the House, however, insisted upon their being then read, he had no indisposition to read them.

The CHAIRMAN considered the Committee as incompetent to clearing the galleries. He thought it must be the act of the House.

Mr. DAWSON inquired if the same rules that applied to the House, did not also apply to Committees of the Whole?

Mr. RANDOLPH called for the reading of the President's Message respecting New Orleans.

Mr. GRISWOLD said there was other business, not requiring secrecy, referred to the Committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH repeated his call for the reading of the President's Message.

The CHAIRMAN asked what Message?

Mr. RANDOLPH replied the confidential Message.

Mr. GRISWOLD said that could not be read with open doors.

The CHAIRMAN said the doors could not be closed without an order of the House.

Mr. S. SMITH observed that it had been customary to clear the galleries before the House went into Committee. To save time, he would move that the Committee should rise, in order to obtain an order of the House to that effect.

Mr. GRISWOLD hoped the Committee would not rise. The business he had proposed was of a public, not a secret nature. It was also of a pressing nature, and ought not to be postponed for any other business.

Mr. DANA hoped, indeed, for the honor of the House, they would not exhibit the spectacle of wasting time in going into Committee and then coming out of it without doing anything, but would proceed to the public business.

Mr. RUTLEDGE.—The gentleman from Virginia holds in his hands resolutions that require secrecy. After deciding on the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, he will not be precluded from offering these resolutions.

Mr. EUSTIS said if the House had resolved itself into a Committee for the express purpose of taking into consideration the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut, it would be proper to give it the preference over any other business; and in that case he should have been as ready at this moment as at any other to offer his objections to it. But if it were understood that the House had resolved itself generally into a Committee on the state of the Union, one gentleman from Virginia having made a motion, and another gentleman from Connecticut having afterwards made another motion, that made by the last gentleman being junior in point of time ought to be last attended to. The other gentleman's motion was first in course; and if the gentleman who offered it desired the galleries to be cleared, he had an undoubted right to an order to that effect.

Mr. MACON (Speaker) remarked that a Committee of the whole House was one committee, and a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union another committee. They were distinct committees. The last was never formed for special purposes. He did not recollect that this had ever been done. Whereas the other committee was always formed for a special purpose. The difficulty in this case had arisen from referring the confidential Message to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. He believed it would be well to rise, and separate the two subjects that had been referred to the Committee on the state of the Union.

Mr. GRISWOLD did not understand what the gentleman from Massachusetts meant by priority of motion. The Chairman had determined that the motion of the gentleman from Virginia was not in order, as it could not be submitted to a public committee. After this disposition of that motion, none remained before the Committee other than his own. In point of priority, he rose, therefore, to have his resolution then decided upon. With regard to the proposition of the honorable Speaker, he did not see any reason for it. Was it not as well to decide on this resolution in this Committee as in any other committee? Why, then, rise for the purpose of referring it to a secret committee?

Mr. S. SMITH said, the gentleman from Massachusetts meant by his remarks that the Message of the President had precedence. The gentleman from Connecticut was only now urging what had been decided against him in the House. He thinks he has now an advantage, and presses it.

Mr. S. said, he had not a doubt that the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RUTLEDGE) is very sincere in his opinion, that, if we will agree to submit all power to them, they will indulge us by agreeing to certain subordinate points. But gentlemen will excuse us. We have already taken great pains to divest them of power, and we are not yet disposed to return it into their hands.

We are of opinion that the Message ought to be discussed with closed doors; that is the intention of the motion; let us not take advantage of those who have arguments to offer which they wish not to submit with open doors; let the Committee rise, and the galleries be cleared.

Mr. DANA, in one point, fully agreed with the gentleman from Maryland. They had taken great pains to get power. But he regretted that any political party allusion whatever had been made on this subject. He had supposed it so important, so deeply interesting to all America, that he had hoped all spirit of party would have slept during our deliberations on it; and that we should have shown that we entertained but one sentiment, and were ready, if necessary, to extend one arm in defence of our invaded rights.

Mr. L. R. MORRIS expressed his disagreement with the Speaker on a point of order—

When the question was taken on the rising of the Committee, and carried in the affirmative—ayes 49, noes 37.

The Committee accordingly rose, and the Chairman reported that they had come to no resolution.

A motion was made to adjourn, on which Mr. GRISWOLD called the yeas and nays; which were—yeas 38, nays 51, as follow:

The House was then cleared of all persons, except the members and the Clerk: Whereupon the House resumed the consideration of a confidential communication from the President of the United States, received the thirty-first ultimo.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, to whom were referred the Message of the President of the United States of the twenty-second and thirtieth ultimo, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said Message, together with the documents transmitted therewith, be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House receive, with great sensibility, the information of a disposition in certain officers of the Spanish Government at New Orleans, to obstruct the navigation of the river Mississippi, as secured to the United States by the most solemn stipulations.

That, adhering to the humane and wise policy which ought ever to characterize a free people, and by which the United States have always professed to be governed, willing, at the same time, to ascribe this breach of compact to the unauthorized misconduct of certain individuals, rather than to a want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty, and relying, with perfect confidence on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive, they will wait the issue of such measures as that department of the Government shall have pursued for asserting the rights and vindicating the injuries of the United States: holding it to be their duty, at the same time, to express their unalterable determination to maintain the boundaries, and the rights of navigation and commerce through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

THURSDAY, January 6.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements, marked A and B, relating to the internal revenues of the United States; as also an explanatory letter thereon, from the Commissioner of the Revenue; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the fourteenth ultimo, the memorial of Henry Messonnier, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, to whom were referred, on the twenty-fourth ultimo and third instant, a report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Peter Charles L'Enfant; also, a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing sundry documents relative to the claim of Peter Charles L'Enfant, for planning and laying out the City of Washington, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said report, letter, and documents be re-committed to the Committee of Claims.

CESSION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on his resolution respecting Louisiana.

Mr. DAWSON was opposed to the motion, for reasons before assigned.

Mr. GRISWOLD said the gentleman did not understand what he had proposed. It had been the wish of gentlemen to separate the consideration of his resolution from other subjects referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. For which purpose he had been willing to refer it to a Committee of the Whole. But he was averse to referring it to a secret committee; as he did not perceive its connexion with any subject that required secrecy. The discussion on it ought, in his opinion, to be public. It was not necessary for him to repeat that it was of a pressing nature. It respected the obtaining information on a subject, he would say, of greater importance than any which could come before Congress that session. One third of the session was gone, and yet the Legislature had no information before them. He hoped there was no disposition entertained by gentlemen to embarrass this proposition with points unconnected with it. The proposition was extremely simple. Called upon by the President to legislate on the subject of the cession of Louisiana, we do not know the precise state of that cession. To legislate correctly, we want to be informed of all the circumstances. If gentlemen are disposed to deny us this information, let the denial be public. Do not let them refer this motion to a secret committee, where they may deny us the information we ask on reasons which we cannot divulge. Mr. G. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. S. SMITH asked if this were not the precise motion decided yesterday by the House? He thought it had been referred to a Committee of the Whole. He had considered it as having taken that course. When we go into Committee the gentlemen will see whether we shall refuse them the information. Perhaps we shall see that it is of such a nature as we ought to possess. He did not himself know how that was; nor did he mean to commit himself by any remarks which he had made. He trusted gentlemen would remember their vote yesterday, and not suffer themselves to be put out of their course by this extraordinary mode of conducting business.

Mr. LOWNDES demanded whether, even if the motion were the same, there was any impropriety in putting it again to day; and whether it were not perfectly consistent with the rules of order to go into a Committee, and take up the resolution? If there ever was a resolution offered to that House which ought to obtain an unanimous vote, it was that of his honorable friend from Connecticut; which proposes simply the calling for such information as the President might see fit to give on a most important subject that had excited the sensibility of the whole nation. The President himself, in his Message, alludes to the subject as one which may require Legislative interposition, and gentlemen persist in refusing us this information. It was a most extraordinary circumstance in the annals of the United States, that, notwithstanding the magnitude of the cession of Louisiana, the length of time since it was made, and the necessary consequence of having a new and powerful neighbor on our frontier, we had yet no official information on the subject. The President in his Message really tells us nothing. He says "the cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France, which took place in the course of the late war,"—this we had been told long before by the public prints, and in a discussion before the British Parliament—but he goes on and says—"will, if carried into effect, make a change in the aspect of our foreign relations, which will doubtless have just weight in any deliberations of the Legislature connected with that subject." To this the understanding of every schoolboy is competent. It was really surprising that gentlemen should wish to reject such a call as this. It was not probable that the President had been so unmindful of his duty as not to have demanded an explanation through our Ministers at the Court of Spain, or at Paris. If he has this information, and it is of a nature proper to be known to us, we ought immediately to obtain it, that we may not be slumbering at our posts on an infraction of our rights.

Mr. L. suspected gentlemen had not correctly attended to the resolution. It only requests the President to lay such information before the House as he may think proper. Are gentlemen then afraid to trust to the discretion of the President? Are they apprehensive lest he should communicate that which is improper? He hoped they had more confidence in the Executive. He thought this call should precede any resolutions. He could not disconnect the shutting of the port of New Orleans from the cession of Louisiana. There appeared to be a natural connexion between these two events. He was afraid that the shutting the port was ominous of the disposition of Spain to cede the province to France, independently of any incumbrances she may have imposed upon herself. He was afraid France in this transaction would consult her interests and convenience, and not our rights. We well knew the grounds on which that nation interpreted treaties, and we had no reason from that knowledge to repress our fears. An observation of the gentleman from Virginia had given him great uneasiness. That gentleman had told us, if Spain had ceded Louisiana to France she had a right to cede it. This Mr. L. was not prepared to say. He did not think Spain had a right to give to America what she pleased; much less give her a new neighbor, under circumstances different from those by which she held the province. He was not, however, then disposed to discuss the abstract question involved in this subject. He trusted the resolution calling for information would be agreed to. The House need not fear that, in asking this information, they would not speak the sense of the people; and, if other measures were necessary, they would also, in adopting them, speak the sense of the nation.

H. OF R.

Cession of Louisiana to France.

JANUARY, 1803.

Mr. BACON said it was not uncommon to hear of extraordinary occurrences in that House. One mode of reasoning yesterday had great weight, that asserted a connexion between the resolution and the subject of New Orleans, which had been taken up and referred to a committee with closed doors. One subject appeared to him to be not only nearly connected, but to form an essential part of the other. For what purpose this resolution should be separated from the general subject, he could not conceive. Why do we want information, but that we may have a more clear view of the general subject? He could not see any detached purpose for which it was required. Why then divide it into little detached parts? Until he could hear reasons for such a division, he should be against the reference.

Mr. HEMPHILL observed that the gentleman was mistaken in what passed yesterday. The gentleman from Maryland had first stated the subjects as similar; that ground was afterwards abandoned, and they were considered as distinct. There were only two points connected with the subject before the House in which documents could be required or secrecy necessary. The one related to the cession of Louisiana; the other to the shutting the port of New Orleans. The former, though not referred to a committee, was as important as the latter, which had been referred. In the last case we deemed it important to have and request papers. The resolution before them related to the first point; it had been deemed of sufficient importance to refer it to a committee, and this afforded good reasons for calling for papers respecting the cession. He begged leave to refer to the Message, which says the cession "will, if carried into effect, make a change in the aspect of our foreign relations, which will doubtless have just weight in any deliberations of the Legislature connected with that subject." The House will perceive that the language of the Message is hypothetical—the words are, "if carried into effect." How then can we deliberate on this subject, unless we know the degree of probability there is, that it will be carried into effect? A knowledge of the circumstances necessary to ascertain this, appeared to be absolutely indispensable.

If likely to be carried into effect, the next question is, as to the time when it will be carried into effect. When these two inquiries were solved, another naturally offered itself: Is France to take the province subject to existing treaties, or as she shall receive it at the time of delivery? All these circumstances it was necessary for Congress to know, before they could act correctly.

What necessity there was for secrecy in the discussion of this resolution, Mr. HEMPHILL could not conceive. All the information we have on the subject is contained in the President's Message, which every person in the United States knows as well as we do. It appeared to him that when their deliberations turned on facts which everybody knew, they ought to be public. His ideas of secrecy were these: that policy might require certain facts to be kept secret for a time; but, when made known, their arguments on them ought not to be secret. In this opinion he was strengthened by the rule of the House. [Mr. H. here read the rule on that point, which prescribes that the galleries shall be cleared whenever a confidential communication shall be received from the President, or whenever the Speaker or any other member shall inform the House that he has communications to make which he conceives ought to be kept secret.] Mr. H. asked on which branch of this rule, could the arguments of gentlemen be predicated? The President had not sent them a confidential communication, nor had any member said he had communications to make which he conceived ought to be kept secret. The information referred to in the rule meant facts, and not arguments drawn from facts. He concluded by saying he saw no occasion whatever for discussing this proposition with closed doors.

Mr. DAWSON.—The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) says there is a material connexion between the shutting the port of New Orleans and the cession of Louisiana. After, then, that part of the discussion which related to New Orleans had been ordered to be conducted with shut doors, how proper was it in him to introduce into debate a subject intimately connected with it? His opposition to the present motion did not arise from an indisposition fully to discuss the subject to which it referred; but from an indisposition to delay the discussion of the motion offered by his colleague. Against the present motion he should vote, because it promised nothing useful, and might be mischievous. We have been told that this subject is important and pressing. That it was important he felt; but he did not believe it was pressing. He could say, if the time should ever arrive when it became that House to act, this was not the time. When the time did arrive, he was prepared to act. Gentlemen were very anxious on this subject. He rejoiced to witness their anxiety. But he and his friends were not now to hear who were the friends of the Western country. The people of that country doubted not the protection of the Government. They were warmly attached to the Government, and knew that everything would be done, that ought to be done, to protect and defend their rights.

Mr. BACON, said if he understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) he perfectly agreed with him in opinion, that this resolution was connected with the subject of New Orleans. He agreed with him as to their inseparable connexion. But the only difference was that they inferred opposite consequences from the same premises. He, Mr. B., contended that the resolution made a part of the same general subject, and ought not to be divided from it. They say it ought to be divided.

Mr. HEMPHILL, replied that he had spoken as plainly as he could. He had said the subjects were distinct.

Mr. GODDARD.—The gentleman from Massachusetts yesterday told us the call for information ought to be public, though the information itself should be secret. This reasoning had been satisfactory to him then; he had hoped it would have also proved so to day. But it appears that he is now for sending us to a secret committee. Mr. G. said in his opinion, the call ought to be public, whatever the nature of the information might be. This information gentlemen will either deny or grant. They say it is not to be denied. Why then go into a committee? And if granted, why not grant it without assigning reasons, as well as with assigning them? Are we to be told by the gentleman from Virginia, there is no occasion for this call; that we have information enough? How does that honorable gentleman get his information? If from the Cabinet, are we, the representatives of the people, to obtain it from him? Surely this will be degrading to our characters. We may believe it is true as coming from him, but, as representatives, we should spurn at receiving it in such a channel. We want official information, but gentlemen say they want to go into secret committee on this resolution. What will be the good of this? Though he could not say what was done in secret yesterday, he might say what had not been done. They had done nothing; and if they went into secret session again, the consequence would be the same.

Mr. RANDOLPH felt extremely reluctant to rise in this stage of the discussion, but he deemed it time to repel insinuations so frequently thrown out as perhaps to gain some credit, if they were permitted to pass entirely unnoticed. We are averse to take up the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut, and wherefore? Because, as our opposers would fain have it believed, we are insensible to the vast interest affected by the obstruction of the Mississippi? No, sir, because we are alive to this delicate and momentous subject; because we wish to act upon it; because we wish to go into committee on the confidential Message of the Executive; because the information required by the motion before you is not necessary to determine us in the course which we ought, and, I trust, will pursue; and because these preliminary questions, whatever be their object, are, in effect, only calculated to retard and to embarrass the decision of this House on this great question. Sir, I am content that gentlemen should repeat after each other the trite observations which have been so often reiterated of the magnitude of the object in question. I am content that they should make the best possible display of their ardor on this occasion. But wherefore this exhibition of a zeal so inordinate as to arrogate to itself all sensibility to the national welfare? Since gentlemen insist upon it, since they provoke the discussion, I must request to be indulged in some remarks on the history of this subject. And in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GODDARD,) I must be permitted to observe that such of my information as may have been derived from the Executive is equally accessible to every member of this House, and I believe to every reputable citizen in the Union, who chooses to apply for it. That, however, which I am about to present, is derived from a source accessible to the whole world. It is to be found in a document of inestimable value, (the debates of the Virginia Convention in 1788,) and might truly be said to be official. It is an account given in his official character of member of Congress, and under the Old Confederation, by that able and eminent man, that faithful and illustrious public servant, the late Governor of Virginia, to the Convention of that State, at their requisition. At his own suggestion the Legislature of the State had declined to insist upon it. To the Convention it was given, (however reluctantly,) as to a paramount authority. [Here Mr. R. read Mr. Monroe's speech.]

"After some desultory conversation, Mr. MONROE spoke as follows: Mr. Chairman—My conduct respecting the transactions of Congress upon this interesting subject, since my return to the State, has been well known to many worthy gentlemen here. I have been often called upon before this, in a public line, and particularly in the last Assembly, whilst I was present, for information in regard to these transactions; but have heretofore declined it, and for reasons that were held satisfactory. Being amenable, upon the principles of the Federal compact, to the Legislature, for my conduct in Congress, it cannot be doubted, if required, it was my duty to obey their directions; but that honorable body thought it best to dispense with such demand. The right in this Assembly is unquestionably more complete, having power paramount to that; but even here I could wish it had not been exerted as I understand it to be, by going into committee for that purpose. Before, however, I enter into this subject, I cannot but observe, it has given me pain to hear it treated by honorable gentlemen in a manner that has appeared not altogether free from exception. For they have not gone into it fully, and given a proper view of the transaction in every part, but of those only which preceded, and were subsequent to that, which had been the particular object of inquiry; a conduct that has seemed too much calculated to make an impression favorable to their wishes in the present instance. But, in making this observation, I owe it to those gentlemen to declare, that it is my opinion such omission has proceeded, not from intention, but their having forgotten facts, or to some cause not obvious to me, and which I make no doubt they will readily explain.

"The policy of this State, respecting this river, has always been the same. It has contemplated but one object, the opening it for the use of the inhabitants, whose interest depended on it; and in this she has, in my opinion, shown her wisdom and magnanimity. I may, I believe, with propriety say, that all the measures that have at any time been taken by Congress for that purpose, were adopted at the instance of this State. There was a time it is true, sir, when even this State, in some measure, abandoned the object, by authorizing its cession to the Court of Spain. But let us take all circumstances into view, as they were at that time, and I am persuaded it will by no means show a departure from this liberal and enlightened system of policy, although it may manifest an accommodation to the exigencies which pressed on us at the time. The Southern States were overrun, and in possession of the enemy. The governments of South Carolina and Georgia were prostrate, and opposition there at an end. North Carolina made but a feeble resistance; and Virginia herself was greatly harassed by the enemy in force at that time in the heart of the country, and by impressions for her own and the defence of the Southern States. In addition to this, the finances of the United States were in a deplorable condition, if not totally exhausted; and France, our ally, seemed anxious for peace; and as the means of bringing the war to a more happy and speedy conclusion, the object of this cession was the hopes of uniting Spain in it with all her forces. If I recollect aright, too, at this moment, the Minister of the United States, at the Court of Madrid, informed Congress of the difficulty he found in prevailing upon that Court to acknowledge our independence, or take any measure in our favor, suggested the jealousy with which it viewed our settlements in the Western country, and the probability of better success, provided we would cede the navigation of this river, as the consideration. The latter circumstances were made known to the Legislature, and they had their weight. All inferior objects must yield to the safety of the society itself. A resolution passed to that effect. An act of Congress likewise passed; and the Minister of the United States had full authority to relinquish this valuable right to that Court, upon the condition above stated. But what was the issue of this proposition? Was any treaty made with Spain that obtained an acknowledgment of our independence, although at war with Great Britain; and such acknowledgment would have cost her nothing? Was a loan of money accomplished? In short, does it appear that even Spain herself thought it an object of any importance? So soon as the war ended, this resolution was rescinded. The power to make such a treaty was revoked. So that this system of policy was departed from, only for a short time, for the most important object that can be conceived, and resumed again as soon as it possibly could be.

"After the peace, it became the business of Congress to investigate the relation of these States to the different Powers of the earth, in a more extensive view than they had hitherto done, and particularly in the commercial line; and to make arrangements for entering into treaties with them on such terms as might be mutually beneficial for each party. As the result of the deliberations of that day, it was resolved, 'That commercial treaties be formed, if possible, with said Powers, those of Europe in particular, Spain included, upon similar principles; and three Commissioners, Mr. Adams, Mr. Franklin, and Mr. Jefferson, be appointed for that purpose.' So that an arrangement for a treaty of commerce with Spain had already been taken. Whilst these powers were in force, a representative from Spain arrived, authorized to treat with the United States on the interfering claims of the two nations, respecting the Mississippi, and the boundaries, and other concerns, wherein they were respectively interested. A similar commission was given to the honorable the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, on the part of the United States, with these ultimatums, 'That he enter into no treaty, compact, or convention whatever, with the said representative of Spain, which did not stipulate our right to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the boundaries as established in our treaty with Great Britain.' And thus the late negotiation commenced, under auspices, as I supposed, very favorable to the wishes of the United States; for Spain had become sensible of the propriety of cultivating the friendship of these States. Knowing our claim to the navigation of the river, she had sent a Minister hither principally to treat on that point; and the time would not be remote when, under the increasing population of the country, the inhabitants would be able to open it without our assistance or her consent. These circumstances being considered, was it not presumable she intended to make a merit of her concession to our wishes, and to agree to an accommodation upon that subject, that would not only be satisfactory, but highly pleasing to the United States? But what was the issue of this negotiation? How was it terminated? Has it forwarded the particular object in view, or otherwise promoted the interests and the harmony of the States, or any of them? Eight or ten months elapsed without any communications of its progress to Congress. At length a letter was received from the Secretary, stating that difficulties had arisen in his negotiation with the representative of Spain, which, in his opinion, should be so managed as that even their existence should remain a secret for the present; and proposing that a committee be appointed with full power to direct and instruct him in every case relative to the proposed treaty. As the only ultimatums in his instructions respected the Mississippi and the boundaries, it readily occurred that these occasioned the difficulties alluded to, and were those he wished to remove. And, for many reasons, this appeared, at least to me, an extraordinary proposition. By the Articles of Confederation nine States are necessary to enter into treaties. The instruction is the foundation of the treaty; for if it is formed agreeable thereto, good faith requires that it be ratified. The practice of Congress has also been always, I believe, in conformity to this idea. The instructions under which our commercial treaties have been made, were carried by nine States. Those under which the Secretary now acted were passed by nine States. The proposition, then, would be, that the powers which, under the Constitution, nine States only were competent to, should be transferred to a committee, and the object thereby to disengage himself from the ultimatums already mentioned in his existing instructions. In this light the subject was taken up, and on these principles discussed. The Secretary, Mr. Jay, being called before Congress to explain the difficulties mentioned in his letter, presented to their view the project of a treaty of commerce, containing, as he supposed, advantageous stipulations in our favor, in that line; in consideration for which we were to contract to forbear the use of the navigation of the river Mississippi for the term of twenty-five or thirty years, and earnestly advised our adopting it. The subject now took a decided form; there was no further ambiguity in it, and we were surprised, for reasons that have been already given, that he had taken up the subject of commerce at all. We were greatly surprised it should form the principal object of the project, and that a partial or temporary sacrifice of that interest, for the advancement of which the negotiation was set on foot, should be the consideration proposed to be given for it. But the honorable Secretary urged, that it was necessary to stand well with Spain; that the commercial project was a beneficial one, and should not be neglected; that a stipulation to forbear the use contained an acknowledgment, on her part, of the right in the United States; that we were in no condition to take the river, and therefore gave nothing for it; with other reasons which, perhaps, I have forgotten; for the subject in detail has nearly escaped my memory. We differed with the honorable Secretary, almost in every respect. We admitted, indeed, the propriety of standing well with Spain, but supposed we might accomplish that end, at least, on equal terms. We considered the stipulation to forbear the use, as a species of barter, that should never be countenanced in the councils of the American States, since it might tend to the destruction of the society itself; for a forbearance of the use of one river might lead to more extensive consequences; to that of the Chesapeake, the Potomac, or any other of the rivers that emptied into it. In short, that the councils of the Confederacy should be conducted with more magnanimity and candor, should contemplate the benefit of all parts upon common principles, and not the sacrifice of one part for that of another. There appeared to us a material difference between stipulating by treaty to forbear the use, and not being able to open the river. The former would be considered by the inhabitants of the Western country as an act of hostility; the latter might be justified by our inability. And, with respect to the commercial part of the project, we really thought it an ill-advised one on its own merits solely.

"Thus was this project brought before Congress, and, so far as I recollect, in this form, and upon these principles. It was the subject of tedious and lengthy discussion in that honorable body. Every distinct measure that was taken I do not now remember, nor do I suppose it of consequence. I have shown the outlines of the transaction, which is, if I apprehend rightly, all that the committee wish to possess. The communications of the Secretary were referred to a Committee of the whole House. The Delegates of the seven Easternmost States voted that the ultimate in the Secretary's instructions, be repealed; which was reported to the House, and entered on the Journal by the Secretary of Congress, that the question was carried. Upon this entry, a Constitutional question arose to this effect: 'Nine States being necessary, by the Federal Constitution, to give an instruction; and seven having repealed a part of an instruction so given, for the formation of a treaty with a foreign Power, so as to alter its import, and authorize, under the remaining part thereof, the formation of a treaty, on principles altogether different from what the said instruction originally contemplated, can such remaining part be considered as in force, and Constitutionally obligatory?' We pressed on Congress for a decision on this point often, but without effect. Notwithstanding this, I understood it was the intention of the Secretary to proceed and conclude a treaty, in conformity to his project, with the Minister of Spain. In this situation I left Congress. What I have since heard, belongs not to me to discover. Other gentlemen have more ample information of this business, in the course it has taken, than I can possibly have been able to obtain; for, having done my duty whilst there, I left it for others who succeeded me to perform theirs, and I have made but little further inquiry respecting it. The animated pursuit that was made of this object, required, and, I believe, received, as firm an opposition. The Southern States were on their guard, and warmly opposed it. For my part, I thought it my duty to use every effort in Congress for the interest of the Southern States. But so far as it depended on me, with my official character, it ceased. With many of those gentlemen, to whom I always considered it as my particular misfortune to be opposed, I am now in habits of correspondence and friendship; and I am concerned for the necessity which has given birth to this relation.

"Whether the Delegates of those States spoke the language of their constituents; whether it may be considered as the permanent interest of such States to depress the growth and increasing population of the Western country, are points which I cannot pretend to determine. I must observe, however, that I always supposed it would, for a variety of reasons, prove injurious to every part of the Confederacy. These are well understood, and need not be dilated on here. If, however, such should be the interest of seven States, let gentlemen contemplate the consequences in the operation of the Government, as it applies to this subject. I have always been of opinion, sir, that the American States, to all national objects, had, in every respect, a common interest. Few persons would be willing to bind them together by a stronger or more indissoluble bond, or give the National Government more power than myself. I only wish to prevent it from doing harm, either to States or individuals; and the rights and interests of both, in a variety of instances, in which they are now left unprotected, might, in my opinion, be better guarded. If I have mistaken any facts, honorable gentlemen will correct me. If I omitted any, and it has not been intentional, so I shall be happy with their assistance to supply the defect.

"Mr. Monroe added several other observations, the purport of which was, that the interest of the Western country would not be as secure under the proposed Constitution as under the Confederation; because, under the latter system, the Mississippi could not be relinquished without the consent of nine States, whereas by the former, he said, a majority of seven States could yield it. His own opinion was, that it would be given up by a majority of the Senators present in the Senate, with the President, which would put it in the power of less than seven States to surrender it. That the Northern States were inclined to yield it. That it was their interest to prevent an augmentation of the Southern influence and power; and that as mankind in general, and States in particular, were governed by interest, the Northern States would not fail of availing themselves of the opportunity given them by the Constitution of relinquishing that river, in order to depress the Western country, and prevent the Southern interest from preponderating.

"Mr. Henry then rose and requested that the honorable gentleman (Mr. Monroe) would discover the rest of the project, and what Spain was to do on her part, as an equivalent for the cession of the Mississippi.

"Mr. Monroe.—Mr. Chairman, I do not thoroughly recollect every circumstance relative to this project. But there was to be a commercial intercourse between the United States and Spain. We were to be allowed to carry our produce to the ports of Spain, and the Spaniards to have an equal right of trading hither. It was stipulated that there should be a reciprocity of commercial intercourse and benefits between the subjects of Spain and the citizens of the United States. The manufactures of Spain were to be freely imported and vended in this country, and our manufactures to be carried to Spain, &c., without obstruction, and both parties were to have mutual privileges in point of commercial intercourse and connexion. This, sir, is the amount of the project of Spain, which was looked upon as advantageous to us. I thought myself that it was not. I considered Spain as being without manufactures, as the most slow in the progress of arts, and the most unwise, with respect to commerce, of all nations under the sun, (in which respect I thought Great Britain the wisest.) Their gentlemen and nobles look on commerce with contempt. No man of character among them will undertake it. They make little discrimination with any nation. Their character is to shut out all nations, and exclude every intercourse with them, and this would be the case with respect to us. Nothing is given to us by this project, but what is given to all other nations. It is bad policy, and unjustifiable on such terms to yield that valuable right. Their merchants have great stocks in trade. It is not so with our merchants. Our people require encouragement. Mariners must be encouraged. On a review of these circumstances, I thought the project unwise and impolitic."

Having completed the reading, Mr. R. resumed his remarks. I have, said he, to ask pardon of the House for detaining them with the reading of so lengthy a document. That it contains perhaps the only correct historical detail extant of this truly curious transaction, must constitute my apology.

I will now ask, Mr. Speaker, who ever have been, and still are, the unshaken friends of the navigation of the Mississippi, and of the Western interests of this Union? It is not my wish, sir, on this occasion, to cast gentlemen opposed to us into the shade—to throw them into the background. All we ask is an equal share of confidence in our zeal to assert this great right, until we shall have proved ourselves unworthy of it. What is there then exhibited from the earliest period of our history? What fact has transpired, which renders us undeserving of that confidence, or which entitles gentlemen on the other side of the House exclusively to it? Shall we then silently submit to the intolerant assumption on their part of all feeling for this important right, involving the vital interests of our country? Shall we sit down contented under the imputation of lukewarmness in this cause? or, shall we tell those gentlemen that under every circumstance, and in all situations, with closed doors, as well as with open doors, we have been, are, and ever will be, the unalterable supporters of the free navigation of the Mississippi?

The sentiments which have been displayed in the course of this proceeding, presents a phenomenon in the history of what are termed regular Governments. When an Administration have formed the design of subverting the public liberties—of enriching themselves or their adherents out of the public purse, or of crushing all opposition beneath the strong hand of power—war has ever been the favorite ministerial specific. Hence have we seen men in power too generally inclined to hostile measures, and hence the opposition have been, as uniformly, the champions of peace—not choosing to nerve with new vigor (the natural consequence of war) hands, on whose hearts or heads they were unwilling to bestow their confidence. But how shall we account for the exception which is now exhibited to this hitherto received maxim? On the one part the solution is easy. An Administration under which our country flourishes beyond all former example—with no sinister views—seeking to pay off the public encumbrances, to lessen the public burdens, and to leave to each man the enjoyment of the fruits of his own labor are, therefore, desirous of peace, so long as it can be preserved consistently with the interests and honor of the country. On the other hand, what do you see? Shall I say an opposition sickening at the sight of the public prosperity, seeking through war, confusion, and a consequent derangement of our finances, that aggrandizement which the public felicity must forever forbid? No, sir, my respect for this House and for those gentlemen forbids this declaration, whilst, at the same time, I am unable to account on any other principle for their conduct. Mr. R. concluded by saying, that he had forborne these observations until they were extorted from him. He had hoped that gentlemen would have let the business take its course, after the decision of yesterday, and that the House would have gone into committee on the confidential Message; but gentlemen had insisted on discussing the merits of the navigation on a preliminary question. The business having taken that turn, he thought it due to himself and friends to repel the odium which it was endeavored to attach to them.

Mr. DANA thought it was not necessary on this subject to enter into a history of political parties in this country. And when the gentleman from Virginia undertook to give a history, he had no idea that he was about giving details of secret history. He had supposed he was about offering a general view of the subject. He did not know that it was to be stated who were friendly or unfriendly to the rights of our Western citizens, much less that there was an established hereditary hostility to them. He had supposed that all the gentlemen on that floor had expressed the wishes of the people; he had supposed there was but one opinion; he had heard of no insinuation of difference. The only difference which he had thought existed was as to the means to be used, and the time when those means should be carried into effect. But as to the natural right, and the ultimate enjoyment of the nation to the free navigation of the Mississippi, he asked what gentleman had charged another with any doubts on that? And when we all agree in this, whence the necessity of calling up the animosities of party? May not gentlemen express their opinions in favor of decided measures, when the voice of the nation had been so audibly expressed, without such expression being construed into a censure upon others? When, too, the opinions of other gentlemen on fundamental points coincided with our own? Is it necessary, when the whole nation is alive, to be moderate in the expression of our ideas? If we do not come from that part of the Union more immediately affected by the late measures at New Orleans, are we therefore to be indifferent and unconcerned spectators of events? If, standing here as Representatives of the United States, we are not at liberty to attend to anything not confined to the trifling district of country we may each of us represent, miserable is the ground on which we stand, and humble indeed our condition! But let me say, even on this ground, the ship owners and the merchants on the Atlantic are deeply interested. Our Western citizens are certainly more deeply interested in the freedom of the Mississippi; but it goes to the great interests of navigation generally. They feel it most; but we feel it much.

This is all I deem it necessary, said Mr. D., to observe on the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia on his historical detail. Sir, this ought not to be made a party question. With respect to the motion before the House, my colleague has drawn it in terms the most respectful. Gentlemen propose to refer it to a Committee of the Whole. To this we object, because we want the information promptly. But the votes of gentlemen prevail, and it is referred. Our next step is to refer it immediately, to avoid delay. To obtain information, full and prompt, is the end of our endeavors. Why are we told of the inconsistency of our means? The course we pursue is plain and direct; that which carries us steadily to our obtaining information; and if the House will not give it to us in the way we wish, we are for taking it in the best way we can. Let it be remarked, that, if no obstacles had taken place at New Orleans, the subject of the cession of Louisiana is referred to in the Message of the President. Is not the information, we ask, important, in the general view, of who are to be our neighbors; where, from the dispersed population of our citizens, the Union is most vulnerable? And in this light it would have been proper to get the information, even if the measures at New Orleans had not occurred. It makes no difference whether those measures are the measures of Spain or of France. The two points were not necessarily connected, though I admit that the proceedings at New Orleans have a bearing on the general subject. With regard to the measures at New Orleans, we have information, and have obtained it. That information has been referred to a Committee of the Whole. We now ask information respecting the cession; and having got it let us refer that also, and deliberate on the measures proper to be taken. Cannot the logical talents of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) distinguish between information and measures? Will he say that premises and conclusions are the same thing? This information is that on which we are to deliberate. I had supposed facts necessary to legislate on. I had thought there was, to be sure, a connexion between one step and another which follows. But will the gentleman say, that whenever we ask information, we conclude upon measures?

The yeas and nays were then taken on the call of Mr. GRISWOLD, on going into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which was lost—yeas 38, nays 48, as follows:

Mr. GRISWOLD said, that notwithstanding the unfortunate situation they were placed in by the refusal of the House, he still deemed it his duty to move other resolutions, which he would read, and move to be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. G. then moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the people of the United States are entitled to the free navigation of the river Mississippi.

Resolved, That the navigation of the river Mississippi has been obstructed by the regulations recently carried into effect at New Orleans.

Resolved, That the right of freely navigating the river Mississippi ought never to be abandoned by the United States.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, Legislative measures are necessary to secure to the people of the United States the free navigation of the river Mississippi.

Mr. DAWSON asked if these resolutions were not necessarily connected with a subject which the House had determined should be discussed in private? If, by this arrangement, other gentlemen had been precluded from offering resolutions, he would ask if it were right in the gentleman from Connecticut to violate a general injunction laid upon all the members?

Mr. GRISWOLD.—There is a Message from the President, of the 22d of December, on this subject that is publicly entered on the Journals. It is on this Message that these resolutions are predicated. I trust I understand the rules of the House well enough to know that I am not to bring forward what it has been enjoined shall be secret.

The question was then taken without further debate, on taking up the above resolutions for consideration, and lost—yeas 32, nays 50.

tion of the President's confidential Message, when the galleries were cleared.

FRIDAY, January 7.

Mr. DAVENPORT, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, to whom it was referred to examine and report such laws of the United States as have expired, or are near expiring, made a report, in part, thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

On motion, it was.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the Military Establishment of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. VARNUM, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, and Mr. CLAY, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

On a motion made and seconded, the House was cleared of all persons present, except the members and the Clerk: Whereupon,

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Messages from the President of the United States, of the twenty-second and thirtieth ultimo, and the documents transmitted therewith; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. VARNUM reported that the Committee had again had the said Messages and documents under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read as follows:

"Resolved, That this House receive with great sensibility the information of a disposition in certain officers of the Spanish Government, at New Orleans, to obstruct the navigation of the river Mississippi, as secured to the United States by the most solemn stipulations.

"That, adhering to that humane and wise policy which ought ever to characterize a free people, and by which the United States have always professed to be governed; willing, at the same time, to ascribe this breach of compact to the unauthorized misconduct of certain individuals, rather than to a want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty; and relying, with perfect confidence, on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive, they will wait the issue of such measures as that department of the Government shall have pursued for asserting the rights and vindicating the injuries of the United States; holding it to be their duty, at the same time, to express their unalterable determination to maintain the boundaries and the rights of navigation and commerce through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties."

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, so much as is contained in the first clause thereof, being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That this House receive with great sensibility the information of a disposition in certain officers of the Spanish Government, at New Orleans, to obstruct the navigation of the river Mississippi, as secured to the United States by the most solemn stipulations."

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole House in their agreement to the same; and resolved in the affirmative.

The last clause of the said resolution being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"That, adhering to that humane and wise policy which ought ever to characterize a free people, and by which the United States have always professed to be governed; willing, at the same time, to ascribe this breach of compact to the unauthorized misconduct of certain individuals, rather than to a want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty; and relying, with perfect confidence, on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive, they will wait the issue of such measures as that department of the Government shall have pursued for asserting the rights and vindicating the injuries of the United States; holding it to be their duty, at the same time, to express their unalterable determination to maintain the boundaries and the rights of navigation and commerce through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties."

A motion was made, and the question being put to amend the said last clause of the resolution, by striking out therefrom the words following, to wit:

"And relying, with perfect confidence, on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive, they will wait the issue of such measures as that department of the Government shall have pursued for asserting the rights, and vindicating the injuries of the United States."

It passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 53, as follows:

"vindicating" next before the words "the injuries of the United States," and inserting the word "redressing," in lieu thereof, it passed in the negative.

The question was then taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the said last clause of the resolution, and resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made and seconded that the House reconsider their decision on the said last clause of the resolution; and the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A division of the question was then called for: whereupon, the first member of the said last clause of the resolution being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"That, adhering to that humane and wise policy which ought ever to characterize a free people, and by which the United States have always professed to be governed; willing, at the same time, to ascribe this breach of compact to the unauthorized misconduct of certain individuals, rather than to a want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty:"

The said division of the question was objected to, as not being in order, and the SPEAKER having decided that the same was in order, an appeal was made to the House from the decision of the Chair; and on the question, "Is the decision of the Chair in order?" it was resolved in the affirmative.

On the question that the House do agree to the said first member of the last clause of the resolution, it was unanimously resolved in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, every member present voting in the affirmative, to wit:

The third member of the said last clause of the resolution being again read, in the words following, to wit:

"Holding it to be their duty, at the same time, to express their unalterable determination to maintain the boundaries, and the rights of navigation and commerce through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties:"

A motion was made, and the question being put, to amend the same by striking therefrom the words "existing treaties," and inserting the word "treaty" in lieu thereof, it passed in the negative.

On the question, that the House do agree to the said third member of the last clause of the resolution, it was unanimously resolved in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, every member present voting in the affirmative, to wit:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Thomas Boude, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, William Butler, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, Samuel W. resolution last recited, and the proceedings of the House on the Messages from the President of the United States, of the twenty-second and thirtieth ultimo, be taken off.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, enclosing information relative to the timber deposited in the navy yards of the United States, for the purposes of building ships of war, in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the third instant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MONDAY, January 10.

Another member, to wit: JAMES A. BAYARD: from Delaware, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A new member, to wit: PETER EARLY, returned to serve in this House, as a member from the State of Georgia, in the room of John Milledge, who hath resigned, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed on the seventeenth ultimo, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to navy yards, and the building of docks, made a report thereon; which was read and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to carry into effect several resolutions of Congress, for erecting monuments to the memories of the late Generals Wooster, Harkemer, Davidson, and Scriven," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and committed to the committee appointed the fourth instant, to prepare and bring in a bill for erecting a monument to the memory of General Harkemer, pursuant to a resolution of Congress, passed the fourth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven.

Sundry motions being made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolutions, respectively, to wit:

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of Major General Joseph Warren, who was slain on Bunker's Hill, on the seventeenth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five; and that the sum of — dollars be appropriated therefor.

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of General Hugh Mercer, who was slain at Princeton, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven; and that the sum of — dollars be appropriated for that purpose.

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of General Francis Nash, who was slain at the battle of Germantown; and that the sum of — dollars be appropriated for that purpose.

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of General Richard Butler, who was killed gallantly fighting in an action with the Indians, on the fourth day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; and that — dollars be appropriated for that purpose.

Resolved, That a monument be erected to the memory of General Nathaniel Woodhull, who commanded the militia on Long Island, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, and was then taken prisoner, and most cruelly put to death by the enemy; and that — dollars be appropriated for that purpose.

Resolved, That a monument be erected to commemorate the virtuous and patriotic conduct of John Paulding, David Williams, and Isaac Van Wert, who, on the twenty-third day of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, intercepted Major John Andre, Adjutant General of the British Army, returning from the American lines in the character of a spy; and that the sum of — dollars be appropriated for that purpose.

Ordered, That the said motions, severally, be referred to the committee to whom was this day committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to carry into effect several resolutions of Congress, for erecting monuments to the memories of the late Generals Wooster, Harkemer, Davidson, and Scriven."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee to whom was referred, on the fourteenth ultimo, the memorial of Thomas Herty; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said report: Whereupon, the resolution submitted by the select committee, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their disagreement, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the Secretary for the Department of State shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, for the use of the United States, — copies of Herty's Digest of the Laws of the United States, to be distributed in the same manner as the laws of the United States were directed to be distributed by the second section of the act, entitled "An act for the more general promulgation of the laws of the United States."

The question was taken, that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their disagreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to purchase, for the use of this House, out of the contingent fund, twelve copies of Herty's Digest of the Laws of the United States.

And, the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire into the expediency of erecting a port of entry at or near the mouth of the Black river, on Lake Ontario.

THE MINT.

Mr. GREGG said he wished to submit a resolution to the consideration of the House, on a subject that must be acted on during the present session. The act establishing a Mint will expire on the fourth day of March next. A resolution now lies on the table for abolishing that institution entirely.

He was not prepared to vote in favor of that resolution, neither did he feel himself at perfect liberty, on the information he now possessed, to vote for a longer continuance of the law. The establishment, it was true, had been expensive, but he expected that, under proper management, it might be rendered useful. The Director, in his annual report made to Congress at the last session, stated that the lots on which the Mint now stands were not sufficiently extensive, and that the machinery was nearly worn out. He said he knew these lots, and he believed that, on account of the convenience of their situation, they might be disposed of to good advantage; perhaps for a sum sufficient to purchase as much ground as would be necessary in another situation, and also to erect suitable buildings for the purpose. If this could be done, there would be but little additional expense incurred in continuing the establishment. He thought it highly important to obtain every possible information on this subject before we are called to act on it, and therefore for the purpose of obtaining that information he would submit a resolution.

Mr. G. then offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business to inquire into the amount for which the whole property of the Mint, including the ground and buildings would sell; and the probable expense of more suitable buildings, and of the machinery necessary for conducting the operations on the principle of steam.—Carried.

NATIONAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. VAN NESS presented a representation from Samuel Blodget, on the subject of a National University, as follows:

"The memorial of Samuel Blodget, late Supervisor of the City of Washington, represents that, owing his appointment chiefly to his zeal in forming several probationary plans for a National University, he conceived it an indispensable duty, after the death of WASHINGTON, to follow the commanding advice and noble example of the common Father of his Country, so irresistibly portrayed in his Farewell Address, and in the clause of his will annexed to his liberal donation therefore. In thus calling, most respectfully, the attention of your honorable body to this part of the will of WASHINGTON, he fulfils a promise made in behalf of more than one thousand subscribers to the same object, whose respectable names accompany this memorial, with a request that a committee may be appointed to consider what portion of the public lots and lands in the Western Territory of the United States, shall be appropriated by Congress to this important institution, in addition to the contents of either of the sites already contemplated therefor within the City of Washington, by WASHINGTON himself, and by the Commissioners thereof. And further to consider the expediency (should it comport with the monumental plan to be adopted) of erecting the statue of 1783, or in lieu thereof an appropriate and characteristic equestrian statue of the original founder of the National University, as a beautiful centre piece for the entire plan, to be surrounded by halls and colleges as they may be built in succession, by the fund to which the whole people of America are now so liberally and so honorably contributing by voluntary subscriptions from Maine to Georgia inclusive; thus virtually following the ancient custom of the original Americans, who, men, women, and children, carried a stone to the monumental pile of a beloved chief.

"It is humbly conceived that no other aid will be necessary for your honorable body to give, till in your wisdom it may be deemed proper to follow the sublime and prophetic advice of WASHINGTON, and to assume the entire direction of the most important object ever contemplated in the united efforts of all parties, persuasions, and classes of the American people; under a firm belief that, provided the Governmental plan and synopsis thereof be maturely considered and wisely adapted, it will promote the views of the sage and provident WASHINGTON, namely: 'To do away local attachments and State prejudices, as far as the nature of things would or indeed ought to admit, from our National Councils,' and, in short, to promote a true amor patriæ, as well as the advancement of new arts and universal science in all useful knowledge; while 'our youth by associating with each other for these purposes, and forming friendships in their juvenile years, will free themselves from those narrow local prejudices which, when carried to excess, are never-failing sources of disquiet to the public mind, and pregnant of the most mischievous consequences to this country.'

"Such are the principles under which this sublime institution, founded by WASHINGTON, and indubitably the best monument to his eternal fame, is now rapidly progressing, to the immortal honor of the American name. Nor does it require uncommon inspiration to foretell, that so long as it shall continue true that parents are naturally attached to the most amiable of their offspring, so long will the patriotic founders throughout the Union, themselves and their posterity, delight to preserve a noble fabric, which, in itself, will unite the most sublime points that can with reason interest a generous, industrious, and an enlightened people, and equally endear them to their country and to each other. And so long as the divine principles that gave birth and strength to the infancy of the University may continue, so long, by turning the tide of emigration in search of learning, shall the American character be the pride and boast of the liberal and learned of all nations, and the dread of every foe to human excellence.

"A synopsis for the University, uniting with it a plan for a free College, adopting and combining therewith the interests of the existing seminaries throughout the Union, accompany this memorial, together with a description or duplicates of several monumental plans, which will remain before the present committee of subscribers, till Congress may think proper to assume the entire direction of this object, in conformity with the ardent wishes and earnest advice so irresistibly enforced by WASHINGTON."

The memorial was accompanied by a plan of the Equestrian Statue of Washington, surrounded by halls and colleges regularly arranged, the whole to be styled the Monument to Washington. Referred to a select committee—ayes 42, nays 27.

The following members constitute the committee: Mr. VAN NESS, Mr. TALIAFERRO, Mr. HILL, Mr. ELMENDORF, and Mr. CUTLER.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the seventeenth ultimo, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to discriminating and countervailing duties, and the act of the British Parliament on that subject, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to discriminating and countervailing duties, and to the act of the British Parliament on that subject, report—

That a duty of six cents per ton is by law imposed on all American ships entering any of the ports of the United States from a foreign port, and on any ship or vessel, not of the United States, fifty cents per ton; and that an additional duty of ten per cent on the duties payable on goods, wares, or merchandise, imported in American bottoms, has invariably been imposed on such goods, wares, and merchandise, when imported in foreign ships or vessels.

That those discriminating duties have tended greatly to increase the navigation of the United States, have given to the ship owners an advantage over foreigners in the carriage to the United States of salt, wine, brandy, sugar, coffee, blankets, and other coarse woolsens, coarse linens, hemp, earthenware, and other bulky articles, and have enabled them to be almost exclusively the carriers of all the fine articles of importation necessary to the consumption of the country. This policy, combined with the advantages resulting from the late war in Europe, had increased the American tonnage to an amount, it is believed, not inferior to that of any nation in Europe, except Great Britain.

The effects of these discriminating duties did not escape the observation of those foreign nations with whom we have had the greatest commercial intercourse.

By the fifteenth article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, dated London, November 19, 1794, the British Government has reserved the right of countervailing those discriminating duties; and the United States bound themselves not to impose any new or additional duty on the tonnage of British ships or vessels, or to increase the then subsisting difference between the duties payable on the importation of any article in British or American ships.

It is believed by your committee, that the Parliament of Great Britain, by a statute passed the 4th of July, 1797, (in the exercise of that reserved right) have exceeded the fair intent and meaning of the Treaty of Amity, &c., and thereby have secured to the ship owners of that nation the exclusive carriage to Great Britain (in time of peace) of some of our most important objects of exportation.

They have selected fish-oil and tobacco (articles of great bulk) as objects on which the highest countervailing duties have been imposed. The countervailing duty on fish-oil being 36s. 3-12 20d. sterling per ton or 252 gallons, and upon tobacco 1s. 6d. per 100 lbs.

In consequence of which a British ship of 250 tons, carrying 250 tons of oil to Great Britain from the United States, will pay £453 15s. sterling less duty thereon than the same oil would pay if imported into Great Britain in an American ship; the whole freight on such quantity of oil would have been, prior to the late war, only £625 sterling; the net freight to an American ship (after deducting the countervailing duty of £453 15s.) would of course be only £171 5s. sterling.

By the same operation, a British ship of 250 tons, carrying 400 hhds. of tobacco, of 1200 lbs. each, to Great Britain from the United States, would pay £360 sterling less duty than would be payable on the same quantity of tobacco imported in an American ship; the whole freight at 35s. sterling per hhd. would only amount to £700 sterling, which (after deducting the countervailing duty of £360) would leave to the American a net freight of only £344 ls. sterling.

Rice, when imported into Great Britain in an American ship, is charged with a duty of 8 pence—8-10d. sterling per hundred weight more than when imported in a British ship; this extra duty amounts on a tierce of rice to about 3s. 9d. sterling; the freight of a tierce of rice may be estimated at 12s. sterling. No person will give 15s. 9d. freight in an American, when he can have the same carried for 12s. in a British ship.

Pot and pearl ashes pay a countervailing duty of 2-14—15s. the hundred weight. A cask of ashes contains about 300 weight; the extra duty on that by an American ship will be 9d. per barrel; the freight of such barrel is presumed to be 5s. or 5s. 6d. sterling in times of peace; a difference of 9d. sterling per barrel will effectually give the carriage to British ships of all the ashes exported from the United States to Great Britain.

The committee take leave to refer the House to a table of duties imposed by Great Britain on goods imported in American and British ships, which was printed the last session of Congress, and is herewith exhibited, (No. 3.) On recurring thereto, an important countervail in the articles of wood of all kinds, a small one in tar, turpentine, pitch, and other articles, will be discovered.

The committee take leave to state, that the Parliament of Great Britain, by a statute, bearing date the 7th of May, 1802, has imposed the following new and additional duties on articles the produce and manufactures of the United States, to wit:

Ashes, pot and pearl, 1s. 6d. the cwt.; ginseng, 6s. the 100 lbs.; indigo, (American,) 12s. the 100 lbs.; bar iron, 13s. the ton; pig iron, 4s. 6d. the ton; pitch, 3s. 8d., tar 2s. 11d., the last of 12 barrels; rosin, 4d. the cwt.; rice, 8d. the cwt.; tobacco, 3s. the 100 lbs.; turpentine, 2s. the ton; beeswax, 5s. 9d. the cwt.; cotton, (American,) 7s. 10d. the 100 lbs.

The countervailing duty of ten per cent. being also levied on all those new duties, (except that on tobacco,) adds further to the injury already sustained by American ships carrying such articles, and secures to British ships the exclusive carriage of the following articles, in addition to the articles already mentioned, to wit: Indigo, iron, ginseng, beeswax, and the important and bulky article of cotton. Prior to the passing of the British statute of May last, American cotton and indigo were free of duty on importation into Great Britain; the countervailing duty on indigo will (in consequence of the duty above stated) be 1s. 2-4 10d. per 100 lbs.; that on cotton, nine pence 4-10 the 100 lbs. The freight of 100 lbs. of cotton may be estimated, in times of peace, at about 8s. 4d. sterling; the difference of nine pence on 8s. 4d. will give a decided preference to British over American ships.

Thus, then, it appears that Great Britain, by her countervailing act, has secured effectually the carrying Discriminating Duties.

H. OF R.

(for her own wants and her foreign commerce) of our fish-oil, tobacco, pot and pearl ashes, rice, indigo, and cotton, and having carriage of those bulky articles, the minor objects (except naval stores) not being sufficiently important to form entire cargoes, will also be carried in British ships.

The committee take leave further to state, that by the same statute of Great Britain, of the seventh of May last, a duty of half per cent. is imposed on all goods, wares, and merchandise (of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain) on their exportation to any port in Europe, or within the Straits of Gibraltar, and of one per cent. on similar goods, when exported to any place, not being in Europe, or within the Straits of Gibraltar, thus subjecting the United States to a duty on exports double that which is paid by the nations of Europe. This discrimination your committee believe to be in contradiction to the spirit of the treaties existing between the United States and Great Britain.

By the statute of Great Britain, passed the fourth of July, 1797, a duty of tonnage was imposed on American ships entering her ports of 2s. sterling per ton, which is admitted as a fair countervail of the discriminating duty of forty-four cents per ton on their ships entering the ports of the United States.

From the preceding view of the subject, it appears to your committee, that American vessels will be preferred to British for the carrying of all the fine manufactures of Great Britain; but that the decided advantages that British ships now have over American, in the carriage of all bulky and important articles of the growth or manufacture of the United States, necessary for the consumption or foreign commerce of Great Britain, will enable their owners to enter into an advantageous competition with the Americans in the carrying from Great Britain to the United States, of British salt, and of all the coarse and bulky articles of the produce or manufacture of Great Britain—for instance:

Salt is charged with only two cents per bushel more when imported in a foreign ship, than when imported in American; this small extra duty has never prevented its importation in British ships.

Earthenware—a crate thereof will cost about £5 sterling. The usual peace freight of such a crate is presumed to be about 20s. or 25s. sterling; the extra duty thereon, being only 1s. 6d. sterling, would be paid by the owner of a British ship rather than not obtain the freight.

Blankets—a bale of ten pieces will cost about £40 sterling, the usual peace freight about 35s. sterling; the extra duty payable, if imported in a British ship, will be 10s. sterling.

Wool hats, oznaburghs, sail canvass, kerseys, negro cottons, flannel, baize, half-thicks, and, in truth, all woollen cloths under 2s. sterling per yard, beer, porter, and a variety of other bulky articles, pay an extra duty so small, when compared with the freight of such goods, that the owners of British ships, when assured of a full return freight from the United States to Great Britain, will find it their interest to agree to pay the extra duty payable on such goods when imported into the United States in foreign ships or vessels.

France also has taken measures to meet the operation of our discriminating duties. In the second year of the French Republic, a decree (relative to the act of navigation of that nation) was passed, by which a duty of tonnage of fifty sols per ton was imposed on foreign vessels entering the ports of France, and of six sols per ton on French vessels.

In the third year of the French Republic, a law was passed imposing a duty of eighteen livres 15 sols per quintal on tobacco imported in French vessels, and of twenty-five livres on tobacco imported into the ports of France in foreign vessels; which duty has since been increased to thirty livres per quintal, when imported in foreign ships, and twenty livres when in French ships; making a difference of one hundred and twenty livres or twenty-two dollars and ninety cents per hog-head of twelve hundred pounds against the importation of tobacco into France in American vessels. This discriminating duty amounts, in fact, to the prohibiting of the importation of tobacco in American vessels into France.

Your committee further state that, by a late law, France has imposed a discriminating duty of fifty per cent. on the duties payable on sugar, coffee, cocoa, and other West India goods, when imported in French ships, on similar goods when imported in foreign ships into her ports.

The committee take leave to exhibit herewith (No. 1) statements of exports, imports, and tonnage, as they relate to France, Great Britain, and the United States. And a statement (No. 2) showing the exports from the United States to the European ports of Great Britain and France, of the following articles, to wit:

Pot and pearl ashes, ginseng, iron, pitch, rosin, rice, tobacco, tar, fish-oil, turpentine, beeswax, and cotton, and the total value of exports to those nations for the year 1802.

Sweden and Denmark have laws imposing discriminating duties highly favorable to their carrying trade. Spain, also, by her navigation laws, gives important advantages to her own shipping over those of foreign nations trading to her ports. Holland, also, has her discriminating duties, which, in their consequences, are injurious to the commercial interest of the United States.

Two modes have presented themselves to your committee, to obviate the disadvantages resulting to the carrying trade of the United States, from the countervailing and discriminating duties already recited. The one to increase our discriminating duties, so as to meet the injuries now experienced from the operation of those and the countervailing duties of other nations. The other to relinquish our discriminating duties, (so far as they relate to goods, wares, and merchandise, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the nation to which the ship by whom the same are imported may belong,) in favor of such foreign nation as will agree to abolish such of their discriminating and countervailing duties, as are, in their operation, injurious to the interest of the United States.

The first mode would, in its consequences, lead to a commercial warfare between the United States and foreign nations. Admit, for instance, that the United States should increase her discriminating duties, will not foreign nations also increase theirs in every instance, and at every time the United States shall pursue their plan of increase? If so, your committee are at a loss to perceive what benefit could arise to the interest of the United States from such a system.

The second mode appears to your committee more consistent with the true interest, as well as with the peaceful disposition of the United States. They, therefore, submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage of ships and vessels, and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty of tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, ought to be repealed; so far as the same respects the produce or manufacture of the nation to which such foreign ship or vessel may belong; such repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation, whenever the President shall be satisfied that the discriminating and countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States, have been abolished."

TUESDAY, January 11.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Director of the Mint. The Message was read, and, together with the report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the seventeenth ultimo, a motion for a repeal of so much of the acts, the one entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States;" the other entitled "An act, supplementary to the 'Act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States,' as relates to the establishment of a Mint.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee of Elections, who were instructed by a resolution of the House of the twenty-ninth ultimo, "to inquire whether JOHN P. VAN NESS, one of the members of this House from the State of New York, returned by the said State to serve as one of its members in the seventh Congress of the United States, has not, since his election as a member of this House, and since he occupied a seat as a member, accepted of, and exercised the office of a Major of Militia under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia, and thereby forfeited his right to a seat as a member of this House," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the fourth instant, the bill for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Hyde," with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, the petition of Hugh Alexander and others, inhabitants of the State of Kentucky, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House tomorrow.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the committee appointed on the thirty-first ultimo, to whom was referred a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, and of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, have leave to report thereon, by way of bill or bills, or otherwise.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Hyde;" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do agree to the said amendment.

CESSION OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, intending, should he succeed, to call up his resolution presented on the 5th instant, viz:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this House, copies of such official documents as have been received by this Government, announcing the cession of Louisiana to France, together with a report, explaining the stipulations, circumstances, and conditions, under which that province is to be delivered up, unless such documents and reports will, in the opinion of the President, divulge to the House particular transactions not proper at this time to be communicated."

I recollect, said Mr. G., when I proposed on a former day that the House should go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering this resolution, the principal arguments in opposition were drawn from its supposed connexion with a subject which had been referred to a secret committee, and, therefore improper for previous or public discussion. Those arguments have now lost their weight. The House have decided on those confidential subjects, and their resolution was published, and I believe it will appear that I was not incorrect in my opinion, that this resolution has no concern with any confidential communications. When before under consideration, the inquiry contemplated was considered important. The information requested must be in possession of the Executive; it cannot be supposed that such documents as would be useful to the House, do not exist in the Executive cabinet. We cannot legislate with a proper understanding, unless we are informed of all the circumstances, conditions, and stipulations, under which that territory is ceded to France. I will not believe that the Executive has neglected to demand such explanations as the honor and interest of the United States require. It is this official information which we want. As we are unembarrassed by other subjects, either of a public or secret nature, I hope the House will now come to a decision; I shall call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWSON moved a postponement of the resolution to a future day.

Mr. MOTT said he was opposed to the resolution, but was for going into Committee of the Whole, and deciding upon it, rather than to be troubled with it from day to day.

Mr. DANA.—I consider the refusal to go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union as a negative upon the resolution. We have been told before, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that it does not amount to a refusal of the resolution. True, it may not be so harsh a mode of putting it aside, but the effect is virtually the same. Will it be made a question whether it is proper to ask for information? The President has recommended the subject to our attention in his message. It is not only proper, but of course becomes our duty, to deliberate, and to request such information from the President, as will assist and enlighten us in our proceedings. It is his Constitutional province to do this, and it would be a reflection on him to suppose that he would withhold any information from the House, on a subject which he had thought so important, as to form part of an official message. It could not have been inserted merely for the sake of rounding off a period. No, sir, the President has undoubtedly sufficient reasons for mentioning this, as a subject worthy of our deliberations; he is designated by the Constitution as the proper person from whom information on subjects of this nature is to be derived; he is supposed to combine the whole; it is not proper to receive it but from an official source. The general subject is mentioned in the following terms:

JANUARY, 1803.

"The cession of the Spanish province of Louisiana to France, which took place in the course of the late war, will, if carried into effect, make a change in the aspect of our foreign relations, which will doubtless have just weight in any deliberations connected with that subject."

Are we to suppose the Executive has not been vigilant in ascertaining the circumstances attending this event? No. Are we to suppose he is unwilling to inform us what they are? No. He must be supposed willing to give the information. Therefore, why should gentlemen prevent us from obtaining that intelligence, which is presumed to exist, and which the Executive must be willing to give?

Mr. RANDOLPH was averse to going into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, if it were understood that the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut was to be taken up. It was not very material to him in what way the House signified their dissent to the measure; but, preferring that which was least circuitous, he hoped they would refuse to take it up in committee. Much pains having been taken to impress a belief that the President had communicated to the House a fact of which he possessed no official information, Mr. R. begged the House to recollect that the tortured ingenuity of gentlemen had been unable fairly to infer the fact from the Executive communications; nor could it be implied from a refusal to concur in the proposed resolution. His opposition to it grew out of the resolution itself. It conveys the suspicion that Spain has ceded Louisiana to France indefinitely, thereby giving to France some color of claim to the countries formerly comprised under that appellation; or that she has made the cession by limits incompatible with her engagements to us; and that in either case our right to the navigation of the Mississippi may have been impaired. For, if you suppose in this transfer of her property that Spain has paid due regard to her stipulations with us, the resolution ceases to have an object. Now, sir, wherefore cast this imputation on Spain?—especially at this crisis, when, as I am informed from a respectable source, one of the first characters in the Union is recently nominated Minister to that Court, for the purpose of adjusting all differences on this subject?

I should have supposed another reason would have deterred the gentleman from persisting in this call. That gentleman and his friends had recorded on the journals of this House their solemn determination, however sensibly they might feel the injuries inflicted on the rights and interests of these States, to refuse all co-operation in the support of those rights and interests so long as the direction of the Government should be retained by those who now possess it. For, after having expressed their disapprobation of that clause in a resolution lately adopted by the House to affect our rights of limits and of navigation through the Mississippi, objecting to no other part of it, they had, nevertheless, refused to give their assent to it because of this objectionable passage. There was a time, sir, when such conduct would have been denounced by a portion of this House as the essence of Jacobinism and disorganization. Mr. R. concluded by saying that he thought it unwise at this time, in the very cradle of the negotiation, to throw out insinuations which would have a tendency to irritate or disgust the Spanish Court.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—I did not expect that the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) would, in the face of the Journal now on the table, in contradiction to the knowledge of every gentleman in this House, have made the declaration we have just heard. Have we given our vote that we would not defend the free navigation of the Mississippi? Have we not been ready to unite in adopting those measures which the infraction of treaties and our violated rights demand? I appeal to our journals. What has been done, there appears, and will contradict the assertions of that gentleman. When the resolution was under consideration in the secret committee, which the gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) emphatically called HIS OFFSPRING, there were two votes taken on certain parts or members of it, previous to the main question. A motion was made to strike out the following clause:

"And relying with perfect confidence on the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive, they will wait the issue of such measures as that department of the Government shall have pursued for asserting the rights and vindicating the injuries of the United States."

I voted against this part of the resolution for two reasons: first, because I could not express a confidence which I did not feel; and secondly, because I was not satisfied with a resolution to do nothing. I thought we ought to do something; that it was not proper for the Legislature to sit as idle spectators of an important political transaction, which required legislative interference. I thought we ought to prepare for the worst. These were the reasons, Mr. Speaker, which influenced my conduct upon the motion for striking out. But how did we vote on the motion for agreeing to the following clause?

H. OF R.

Cession of Louisiana to France.

JANUARY, 1803.

"Holding it to be their duty at the same time to express their unalterable determination to maintain the boundaries, and the rights of navigation and commerce, through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties."

Did we refuse our assent? Did we object to a syllable contained in this part of the resolution? No, sir, the vote was unanimous. Every member of the House stands pledged to support the sentiments therein expressed. On this point there was no difference of opinion. I appeal to your journals, sir, and to the recollection of every gentleman who was on that secret committee, whether I am not correct. It is true that there was a difference of opinion in the secret committee upon the other part of the resolution; on one side of the House it appeared proper to express great confidence in the present Executive, and, leaving everything to that department, to do nothing ourselves; whilst on the other side, as we did not feel that confidence, we could not express it, and, believing the occasion demanded legislative interference, we thought it necessary to prepare for the worst. How, then, can we be charged by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) with having recorded our determination not to protect the rights and interests of these States, when our votes, appearing on your Journal, not only prove our unalterable determination to defend those rights, but likewise prove that we were willing to leave the vindicating of those rights entirely to the Executive, and were earnestly desirous of adding thereto all the aid which the Legislature could contribute, and that we have been prevented from pursuing this course by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) and his friends? I must be permitted again to express my astonishment that the gentleman can with any face make these charges, and again to appeal to your Journal, and the recollection of every gentleman, for a contradiction of these unmerited aspersions.

When the main question was taken, we refused our assent. Not because we were unwilling to adopt such measures as circumstances might require; but because we could not sanction those expressions of unbounded confidence in the Executive, and that determination to do nothing, which the resolution contained.

As another argument against this resolution, we are told it is calculated to irritate and impede a negotiation, which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has informed us is about to commence, and, I must say, about to commence at a very late period; after an expiration of one year since the cession of that territory to France. Let us recur to the resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this House copies of such official documents as have been received by this Government, announcing the cession of Louisiana to France, together with a report explaining the stipulations, circumstances, and conditions, under which that province is to be delivered up; unless such documents and reports will, in the opinion of the President, divulge to the House particular transactions, not proper at this time to be communicated."

Is this the language of irritation? Is there an offensive sentence either to the Court of Spain or the Republic of France? Not one. So far from impeding negotiation, it might lead to measures which would accelerate the agency, and insure terms more advantageous. To be ready for any and every event, would evince on our part a disposition to demand, and the power to enforce reparation if refused. Inactivity and silence in the Legislative department will indeed retard successful negotiation, by depriving a Minister of powerful and unanswerable arguments.

Mr. S. SMITH said, it would be recollected, that on the first day the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut was offered, it struck him as improper, and that it was at his instance it had been ordered to lie on the table. The more he had considered the nature of that resolution, the more averse to it had he become. So far from his original dislike to it having been removed by the arguments advanced, it had been confirmed, and particularly by what had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia. The gentleman from Connecticut does not perceive, or is unwilling to acknowledge that there is anything in his resolution that implies unfairness on the part of Spain, or that derogates from the honor of her character; but let him read the resolution. Mr. S. then read as follows:

"That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before this House copies of such official documents as have been received by this Government, announcing the cession of Louisiana to France, together with a report explaining the stipulations, circumstances, and conditions, under which the province is to be delivered up."

Does not the gentleman who drew this resolution seem to believe, from the express words of it, that the conduct of Spain has been unfair, and that she may have adopted measures derogatory to her character and honor? Shall we send a Minister hampered by such a resolution?

Let the gentleman recollect the conduct of this House on a similar occasion. When an order of the British Court issued to seize all American vessels, wherever found, certain spirited resolutions were proposed in that House to show the dissatisfaction of the Government at this unjust measure, and its disposition, if necessary to resist it. The gentleman will recollect, that at that crisis, and pending those very resolutions, a Minister was appointed. Did not the gentleman's friends immediately state the impropriety of passing those resolutions? The fact was, that gentlemen on both sides felt the force of the suggestion, and the resolutions were withdrawn. Mr. S. thought it wise, prudent, and proper, to pursue on this occasion the same course. He could conceive of no good end which could be answered by the resolution. Is the gentleman really in earnest in his inquiries at this time? and if the effect of his resolution should be to show that the stipulations are injurious to our rights, would he know how to act? He would be for acting spiritedly, no doubt; and yet, at this very moment, when he professed such a declaration, he declares to the world, that he has no confidence in the Executive, who is now pursuing the proper measures! I cannot, therefore, conceive that the gentleman is in earnest, after the vote which he and his friends have given of a want of confidence in the Executive. I cannot consider their conduct as intended to promote the real interests of their country; but as calculated to bring the country into a situation from which it cannot withdraw, without pursuing measures attended with expense and blood.

JANUARY, 1803.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—I trust neither this House, nor the American people, can be deceived as to this transaction. What I have stated the Journals confirm, and I should call for the reading of them, if I were not informed by the Clerk that they were at the printer's. A resolution passed this House, expressing its disposition to assert the rights of the United States, in relation to their established limits, and to the navigation of the Mississippi. That resolution contained an expression of confidence in the Executive. Gentlemen moved to strike it out and failed. In every other part they concurred, separately and distinctly. But to the whole they gave their negative. What is the inference? That they will not assert our rights because they have no confidence in the Executive. Liken this to a bill: A clause is moved to be stricken out; it is retained. Those who object to that clause vote against the final passage of the bill. It is nevertheless carried; it becomes law. Are not those who voted against it fairly to be considered as enemies to the law? So have I a right to enumerate that gentleman and his friends, opponents to the measure which I submitted to the House; and yet, sir, although I stated every fact mentioned by the gentleman himself, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) except the final vote, which he took care to keep out of sight; although I mentioned expressly their concurrence in every other part of the resolution, it is asked with what face I can make such a statement in the teeth of your Journals? Sir, let me tell that gentleman, not with the face of a prevaricator, but with the face of a man of honor and a gentleman; not with the face of one using terms intended to convey more than meets the ear, with a view of explaining them away when convenient; not with a design of simulating what I do not believe, or of dissembling my real purpose. The House will recollect, sir, that in the committee, the objection of the gentleman from Connecticut was confined solely to the expression of confidence in the Executive, there was then no reason to believe that there was any other. After protesting against this expression, and suffering it even to prevent his concurrence in any measures for the common good, he comes forward with another resolution, whether to benefit that cause which he has refused to espouse, or to diminish that confidence which appears so much to have disturbed him, I leave the House to determine. But Louisiana is ceded to France. It is so. Of this fact, we have official information. But let it be remembered that it is yet in the hands of Spain. The injury which we have received is from officers of that Crown. The reparation is to be demanded from the same quarter. Now what has the information desired by gentlemen to do with any such negotiation? When France shall have taken possession of this province; when we shall have made pretensions inconsistent with our honor, or with our rights in that quarter, then will it be time enough to take up this subject. This is a transaction, which if it ever does take place, must pass under the immediate cognizance and control of this House. Let gentlemen recollect that the treaty of cession is of an old date, and Louisiana is, notwithstanding, still in the possession of Spain. Shall we then suggest to France our expectation that she will set up a claim inconsistent with our rights; that she may have received a colorable pretence for violating them? Shall we thereby invite her aggressions? In whatever hands this country may be eventually placed, or by whomsoever our rights may be invaded, I doubt not a disposition will always be found to defend them. But it is with the actual possessors that we must negotiate; it is from them we must demand redress, and not from any nation who may possess a reversionary right to the province of Louisiana.

Mr. BACON said that there was one question before the House, and they were debating upon another, in an animated manner and on an extensive scale, before they come to it. It would be recollected, he hoped, that this question was not then before the House. To what point, therefore, could these discussions lead? He was for going into a Committee of the Whole, and meeting the resolution face to face.

Mr. DANA said that the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be correct, were it not for the objections made to the resolution. That question is, therefore, fairly before the House; and the real point is, whether the House will, or will not, adopt the resolution requesting information. To adopting this resolution, one objection is urged by the gentleman from Virginia, and enforced by the gentleman from Maryland. This resolution, say they, may irritate the Court of Spain, and this will be improper. One gentleman has said that the language of propriety is uniform and consistent. Let gentlemen look then at the resolution, long since offered by the gentleman from Virginia, requesting papers in relation to a violation of compact on the part of Spain in the late proceedings at New Orleans. Let me ask, is there anything in this calculated to gratify the courtly delicacy of a Castilian? Here Spain is explicitly charged with a violation of her engagement with us. Look at the resolution that took its birth in secret committee, and which might be termed the offspring of the intellectual energies of the gentleman from Virginia. It is willing to ascribe this breach of compact to the unauthorized misconduct of certain individuals, rather than to a want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty. If this were not the style of direct complaint, it was, at least, harsh, and in no wise courtly. Look now at the resolution proposed by my colleague. Compare them, and if there is not a revolution in the force of language as well as in other things, say if the language of my colleague's resolution is not that of civility, moderation, and even flattery, compared with the language of the other two?

H. OF R.

Cession of Louisiana to France.

JANUARY, 1803.

[Mr. DANA having read Mr. GRISWOLD's resolution proceeded.]

What is there here that implicates the character of Spain? If there is any fault in mentioning the cession, if that is calculated to irritate Spain, the fault lies with the President; for he first mentioned it. This argument, then, must be abandoned. There is nothing in this resolution that can impede negotiations; it is not my intention that this House should take any measures to impede, but that we should take measures to give additional force to negotiation. If I understand what will give most efficacy to Executive negotiations, it is when the world are assured that this House will support the President in all proper and necessary measures for vindicating our rights. But, say the gentlemen, is it possible that we can be for vindicating the rights of the citizens when we have withdrawn our confidence from the Executive? It is true we could not agree with gentlemen in their terms when they avowed "a perfect confidence in the vigilance and wisdom of the Executive." The gentleman from Virginia represented this as the theory of the Government. We could not agree with him. We voted for striking this out. It is unnecessary to mention our motives for this in detail. This might be to imitate. What! "relying with perfect confidence in the Executive"—is this the language of the Constitution, as it respects any man? The resolution does not limit the confidence reposed to any degree, but ascribes a perfection of wisdom and vigor, which ought not to be reposed in any being subject to the ordinary frailties of human nature. Besides, there is an expression of confidence resulting from the Constitutional powers of the Executive, which may be correct. But it will be recollected that the powers of the Executive are not competent to ulterior measures. He has only the power of negotiation; he has no other. Though he may prevent an aggression by employing force, he cannot enforce compensation for injuries received. It was, therefore, improper to agree to a resolution that pledged ourselves to abstain from doing anything.

The allusion to the case with Great Britain was not correct. Will it be said that less success attended the measures of our negotiation then, because the House manifested a disposition to adopt spirited measures? Or, that there were in that case no measures adopted? Measures were adopted. But here, not a single measure had been.

Mr. RANDOLPH said it was extremely painful to him to be obliged so often to explain what appeared to him almost self-evident. The journals have been quoted, sir, to show that I have cast an imputation on the Spanish Court more injurious than that contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut. I am perfectly willing that the decision of the question before us should depend upon that fact. The resolution, sir, which I had the honor to submit to you, spoke of a fact notorious to the whole world, of a breach of compact, of a violation of treaty, on the part of Spain, which could be neither denied nor justified. It contained an inquiry into this circumstance, and, information having been received respecting it, was followed by a declaration of our willingness to ascribe it to the unauthorized misconduct of their agents rather than to the Court of Spain. The resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut implies a fact highly dishonorable to the Spanish nation—that the Government, and not subordinate, unauthorized persons, has secretly entered into stipulations repugnant to its engagements with us. Put the case between two individuals; suppose a gentleman of this House to receive an injury from either of the gentlemen from Connecticut. In an open and manly manner he speaks of this injury, and in undignified terms of resentment. He inquires into it; having found that it was the act of a subordinate agent, and, no proof being exhibited that it was at the instigation of the principal, he frankly says: There is a violation on your part of your engagements with me, but I am willing to ascribe it to the unauthorized misconduct of your agent. On the contrary, suppose him to insinuate strongly that his opponent has covertly taken steps to injure him by treacherously entering into engagements incompatible with those previously made with him. Sir, that honor which would feel itself wounded by the first of these proceedings, while it was insensible to the other, is very little allied to the Castilian.

But, sir, it seems that this unfortunate resolution betrays so entire an ignorance of the distribution of the powers of our Government as to clothe the Executive with an authority not only not devolved upon it by the Constitution, but which is the peculiar province of this and the other branch of the Legislature. The gentleman (Mr. DANA) denies the power of the Executive to redress injuries received from foreign nations. The resolution, however, speaks only of a disposition to redress those injuries. But let us examine into the fact. Have I, indeed, so far mistaken, and, contrary to my own avowed principles, am so disposed to augment the Executive powers at the expense of the other departments of the Government? Suppose, on the representations of the Executive to the Court of Spain, that Court, which is more than probable, should restore the rights of navigation and deposit, disavow the conduct of their officers in violating those rights, and moreover, punish them for it? Would any person deny that, through the agency of the Executive, constitutionally exercised, the injury was redressed? There were other criticisms of the gentlemen which I well remember, and to which he seems willing to call the recollection of the House. They were chiefly of a verbal nature. The gentleman objected to the expression "vindicating the injuries," which he contended implied the justifying, and not the redressing, of them. I could only reply, that I had been in the habit of hearing that word used in the sense in which I applied it as well as in that contended for by the gentleman. That the meaning of terms in our copious and flexible language should not be settled by provincial acceptance; and that by the only authority then accessible to us (knowing the disposition of the gentleman to bow to authority) it was decided that the word "vindicate" extended as well to the avenging of an injury as to the assertion of a right. I am, however, willing to confess that I have never attended to the technical structure of language with a precision so minute as that of the gentleman from Connecticut; and if the House are again to go to school to become acquainted with it, if again we are to be subjected to the lash of the pedagogue, no man shall have my vote for that high office so soon as the gentleman from Connecticut.

JANUARY, 1803.

When the resolution which I submitted to you was under consideration, I did defend the expression contained in it, of confidence in the Executive, on the theory of our Government. I am still ready to defend it on the same principle. By the Constitution of the United States, the Executive is the representative of the United States to foreign nations. It is furnished with organs by which to receive their propositions, and to communicate our own. The Constitution, therefore, presumes that to this department may be entirely confided our negotiations with foreign States. To this House is given the sole power to originate money bills, and the Constitution supposes that a perfect reliance may be had upon it for executing this all important trust. On the Senate, in like manner, is devolved the right of trying impeachments, and perfect confidence is placed in the wisdom and justice of their decision. The same confidence is reposed in the Executive with respect to exterior relations. Without adverting, therefore, to the character of the individual, we had the same right to presume that the constituted authority would take the proper steps in relation to his department, that he has to presume that we will raise the necessary revenue and pass the proper laws. Until, then, it could be shown that some specific act of the Executive had rendered that department unworthy of our confidence, we might consistently express it: and, even if proof of such misconduct could be established, it would not alter the tenor of the Constitution, however the individual might be affected by it. For your Constitution, sir, is not of that precarious nature which depends on the fluctuating characters of particular men. Mr. R. concluded by declaring his reluctance, then increased by indisposition, to be so frequently called upon the floor, but he felt himself in honor bound to defend a motion made by himself, and which had called forth such repeated animadversions from the other side of the House.

Mr. GODDARD.—The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has complained so much of the objections to which his secret resolution was exposed, that I feel myself called upon to sustain a part of that complaint which he has seen fit to place to the account of my colleague. The motion, sir, to strike out the word "vindicating," which gave the gentleman the trouble of producing his pocket dictionary, came from me. He attempted to show, by the authority of his dictionary, that the word is sometimes used to signify revenge. Admitting it, I asked then, and I ask now, with what propriety it could be used, even in that sense, in the resolution referred to? We were then speaking of measures which had before that time been taken by the President, regarding the subject to which the resolution referred. Were we to suppose that the President had already taken measures to revenge the injuries of the United States? I had heard of no such intimation. Besides, has he the power to do so, in the manner then suggested by the gentleman from Virginia, by taking possession of New Orleans? I believe not, without the concurrence of Congress. It was therefore absurd, in the highest degree, to use the expression in that resolution; and we had more than one reason for striking out that part of the resolution which contained it.

But this, as well as every other word and letter of this favorite resolution, was pertinaciously adhered to. The gentleman who framed the resolution seemed determined to compel us to eulogize the President—to extort from us a little praise of the man—or reduce us to the necessity of voting against the principle of the resolution, which asserted our right to the free navigation of the Mississippi. This part of the resolution could have been introduced for no other purpose. It also called upon us to pledge ourselves to wait the issue of such measures as the President might have taken, without any knowledge of the nature of those measures, if any had been taken. And this, the gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) now tells us, we might well enough have done, on the ground of the theory of our Government. I did not know, sir, that it belonged to the theory of Government to eulogize the President on all occasions, or express a confidence we do not feel. Nor does it make a part of the theory of our Government, that the President, without the concurrence of Congress, should avenge the injuries of the country. But, sir, we determined not to express a confidence we did not feel, or vote against the principle of a resolution which was agreeable to us; and the rules of the House, notwithstanding all the efforts to the contrary, protected us in carrying that determination into effect. We recorded our votes in favor of such parts of the resolution as we liked, and against that which we deemed exceptionable; and the final vote which was given upon the whole resolution was sufficiently explained by those upon its different parts. But, sir, because we did not vote that we had "perfect confidence" in the Executive, are we now to be told that we are not entitled to the information called for by the resolution on your table? Are those who do not express entire approbation of all the measures of the Administration to be refused all information respecting the most important interests of the country?

Another objection is raised to agreeing to this resolution. Gentlemen say it will offend foreign nations. What does the resolution call for? It calls for information of a fact which we are told in the President's Message exists. Louisiana, says the President, has been ceded by Spain to France. We ask for such documents as he may possess in evidence of that fact. We wish to know the terms and conditions upon which that province is to be delivered up. When this is asked, by the resolution on your table, the right is at the same time reserved to the President to withhold such parts of it (if any such there be) as, in his opinion, ought not to be communicated. And the passage of this resolution is to offend France or Spain! For fear of offending foreign nations we are not to ask or know what is our relative situation with such nations! If, sir, we hold this language, we may indeed avoid the anger of foreign nations, but we shall merit their contempt. But when, in answer to the suggestion that we may offend Spain, the gentleman from Virginia is reminded of his resolution, which charges Spain directly with a violation of treaty, he replies that this language is palliated by our saying that we are "willing to ascribe this violation to the unauthorized conduct of certain individuals, rather than to the want of good faith on the part of His Catholic Majesty." But, in making out this apology, the gentleman has blended two resolutions together. The one to which my colleague referred passed early in the session. In that, Spain was charged directly with a violation of treaty. Nothing was then said about unauthorized conduct of individuals. This reluctance at charging Spain with this violation of treaty was not expressed until a long time after, and is found in the resolution which passed in secret. Indeed, this, as well as all the objections which have been offered to the passage of the resolution on your table, appear to me equally fallacious.

Mr. HUGER said, that having, on a former occasion, had an opportunity of delivering his sentiments in favor of the present resolution, "requesting the Executive to direct the proper officer to lay before the House such official documents, as were in possession of the Government, relative to the cession of Louisiana to France," he felt no disposition to enter at this time into a further discussion of the merits of that resolution, nor should he have again troubled the House on the subject, but for the assertion repeated more than once by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that those gentlemen who thought and voted with himself in the secret committee, had recorded, on the journals of the House, their solemn determination (however sensibly they might feel the injuries inflicted on the rights and interests of these States) to refuse all co-operation in support of those rights and interests, so long as the direction of the Government should remain in the hands of the present Chief Magistrate. This imputation had already, it was true, been very properly repelled by his friend from Connecticut, and it had been triumphantly shown from the journals themselves, with how little justice the insinuation had been made against those who agreed and voted with him on the different parts of the resolution lately adopted in the secret committee. The gentleman from Virginia had, nevertheless, thought proper again to make the assertion;

Mr. H. must, therefore, beg leave again to meet it, and to declare that it was neither authorized by a fair construction of the different votes given on the occasion by yeas and nays, nor to be inferred from anything which had fallen in debate either from himself or any of his political friends. The very contrary, continued Mr. H., is in truth the fact; and had the resolution in question been debated with open doors, it would have been very evident to every one, that the utmost pains had been taken by the other side of the House to place us in this very predicament, and by availing themselves of a point of order, to oblige us, by our votes, not only to declare an implicit and entire confidence in the present Chief Magistrate, but to tie up our hands and bind ourselves not to take a single step in this important business until the Executive was graciously pleased to authorize us to do so. If the doors had been allowed, I say, to remain open during the debate, it would have been evident to every one how much pains were taken to oblige us to commit ourselves on these two points, or to submit to be presented to the world as unwilling to co-operate in any way in the support of the just rights of the nation, and be deprived of an opportunity of showing, as we were anxious to do, our approbation of, and concurrence in, other parts of the resolution; the last sentence in particular, which holds forth our unalterable determination to maintain, in every event, the boundaries and right of commerce and navigation through the river Mississippi, as established by existing treaties. Fortunately, however, the point of order was determined in our favor, and we have had an opportunity to show, and did actually show, by our votes, in the most unequivocal manner, that we were, as well as our political opponents, decidedly in favor of every other part of the resolution, save only that which called on us so unnecessarily to declare ourselves the blind and passive tools of the Executive. Nay, more, he recollected to have declared himself again and again, in the course of the debate, that, although he was not willing at the present moment unnecessarily to express an entire and implicit confidence in the political infallibility of the Executive, yet he certainly had not the smallest hesitation in saying, that he was as ready as any gentleman on the other side, to devote his life and fortune, even under the auspices of the present Chief Magistrate, to the defence of our common country against any and every foreign aggression whatever. He was not, it was true, one of the warm and enthusiastic devotees of the present Administration, and he must honestly acknowledge that he should greatly prefer seeing the reins of Government, at this critical juncture, in the hands of a WASHINGTON! He, nevertheless, recollected that the present Chief Magistrate was placed at the head of affairs by the Constitutional voice of the majority of the American people. He acquiesced, therefore, in their decision, and hoped he might be permitted to avail himself of the advantage of having the doors now open, to repeat again, in the most unequivocal language, that he was as ready as any of the most devoted friends of the Administration, to risk his life and his all (even under its auspices) in asserting the rights and vindicating the injuries of the United States.

He was the more anxious to make a public and open avowal of his sentiments on this subject, because, although it might suit the party purposes for the moment to hold up one side of the House, as so forgetful of their duty, and so hurried away by their political zeal, as to pledge themselves in the face of the world, to give up the most important rights of the nation without a struggle, rather than co-operate with those now at the head of affairs in support of them, yet he thought it all-important that foreign nations at least should be convinced the fact was not so; and that whatever difference of opinion may exist amongst us with respect to our local politics, when called upon to meet and repel the encroachments of any foreign Power, we would have but one sentiment on the subject. To bring about, indeed, an unanimous vote and present to the American people the agreeable and consoling spectacle of the National Legislature acting with one mind and with mutual confidence in each other on this great national question, big with such important consequences, had been his sincere wish, as well as that, he was confident, of every member on his side of the House. They had, consequently, left no stone unturned to effect the desirable end; they had called upon and conjured the majority to waive for the moment all party questions; to meet them on such fair and honorable grounds as might enable them to act with perfect unanimity in support of such measures, as it might be found expedient to adopt. Nor could gentlemen have forgotten the eloquent and conciliating speech of the member from Connecticut, and the ardent desire he had evinced, in common with all his friends, to bury the hatchet and lay aside every other consideration but the public good. It was scarcely necessary, however, to remind the House of the manner in which these proffers of conciliation and the anxiety on our part to obtain an unanimous vote on this important occasion were received. It is in the memory of every one, that they were treated with the most sovereign contempt, hooted and spurned at, and the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) in particular, went so far as to declare, that he neither wanted nor wished anything like unanimity to appear in support of the measures which might be adopted; nay, that unanimity, however attainable, was not desirable. Mr. H. said he would make no comment on these sentiments and this conduct on the part of the majority; and as he did not rise for the purpose of entering into a further discussion of the main question, he should no longer encroach on the time or patience of the House, but leave them and the world to determine whether he or his political friends had, by their votes or conduct, in the course of the transaction alluded to, afforded any just ground for the imputation of the gentleman from Virginia, whatever plausibility he had ingeniously endeavored to give it.

The question was then taken, on the requisition of Mr. GRISWOLD, by yeas and nays, and carried in the negative—yeas 38, nays 52, as follows:

Mr. S. SMITH said he had a communication to make, which in his opinion, required secrecy; whereupon the galleries was cleared.

After a short time they were opened; when the House resumed the consideration of Mr. GRISWOLD's resolution, which lay on the table.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, on the state of the Union, to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, a motion respecting official information of the cession of Louisiana to France, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said motion do lie on the table.

Mr. BAYARD said he lamented much, that unavoidable occurrences had prevented his attending in his place when the resolution was under consideration upon the motion to go into a Committee of the whole House. Having no knowledge of the arguments then employed to induce the adoption of the resolution, he should abstain from many remarks which obviously presented themselves on the subject, lest he should fall into repetitions of what was familiar to the minds of the House from the observations of other gentlemen. He must, however, be allowed to state that it was a practice little known heretofore, but one which had alarmingly increased of late, to resist a call for information from any branch of the Executive Government. It cannot be on the ground of secrecy, required by the state of affairs, for we have been often told that a Government like ours ought to have no secrets. Though the present times have assumed the character of economical, yet an honorable member of great weight in the House, and whom he did not then observe in his place, had remarked at the last session, with great emphasis and effect, that no disposition to economy should ever induce him to economise information. A stronger case than the present could not exist. The House had been called on to act upon a question touching our foreign relations. On such subjects, it was among the chief duties of the Executive to acquire information. It was for this purpose that Ministers were sent abroad, and their communications were made to the Cabinet, to which we had a right to look upon all occasions for information respecting the proceedings of foreign Governments which implicated the national interest.

It is stated in the Presidential Message, that Louisiana is ceded by Spain to France. This is an important fact. The statement in the Message shows that the President has obtained information relative to the cession after the fact is disclosed, which is the extent of any indiscretion which can be committed on the subject; why conceal from us the circumstances? The naked fact did not furnish sufficient light to enable us to judge of the steps which it would be proper for us to pursue. Though the country had been ceded, yet the possession remained with the Spaniards. This created a presumption that it was not a simple, absolute cession. If the cession be conditional or qualified, or to take effect upon some future contingency, it is extremely material that the House should be informed of the existence of the circumstances.

Mr. B. repeated his regret that he was not present at the discussion of the subject which had taken place, as it was beyond his powers to imagine a ground upon which the information requested by the resolution could be denied. But after the resolution had been in effect negatived on the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole, and as he understood, by a large majority, he should not have risen to trouble the House but for an occurrence which had taken place since the House had made their determination upon the resolution. An honorable member from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH) has just laid upon our table a resolution calling upon the House to place two millions of dollars at the discretion of the Executive. [The SPEAKER here remarked to Mr. BAYARD, that as the doors were no longer closed, it was not in order to refer to what had been done when the doors were closed.] Mr. B. said he had no disposition to transgress the rules of the House; but it was an awkward situation, when, arguing in support of a measure, he was not at liberty to state the strongest reason in favor of it. He would not repeat what had escaped him; but alluding to what was in the knowledge of every member, he considered himself allowed to urge the probability that the House would be called upon for a grant of money. Now, sir, can gentlemen expect that either we or the nation will in any case be satisfied to make a large grant of money, while no information is given of the grounds upon which the grant is required? When money is asked for, information ought never to be denied: and, for his part, he never would consent to give a cent, while information, which ought to be communicated, was withheld.

Mr. B. concluded by observing, that he hoped he might still flatter himself with the expectation, that what had recently occurred, would induce the House to vary from the determination they had made, and adopt the resolution.

The question was taken, that the House do agree to the resolution of Mr. GRISWOLD, and passed in the negative—yeas 35, nays 51, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, January 12.

Mr. MOORE, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, the petition of Matthew Patterson and others, inhabitants and settlers on French Broad river, made a report thereon; which was read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

A petition of Joseph Pannell and others, inhabitants of the Mississippi Territory of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying that the tracts or portions of land which they have located, and made actual settlements thereon, subsequent to the twenty-seventh day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, may be confirmed to the petitioners, in as full and ample manner as grants have been made by the Government of the United States, to actual settlers of lands in the said Territory, prior to the period aforesaid.—Referred.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition from Abraham Stout, praying relief.

On the reference of this petition, a conversation took place, on the propriety and justice of making provision for persons wounded during the Revolutionary war, notwithstanding the interference of the statute of limitations; this provision was warmly urged by Messrs. HELMS and CLAIBORNE. It was finally agreed that the petition should be referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three," with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. HELMS, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, provisions ought to be made, by law, for allowing pensions to persons who do, at this time, labor under disabilities in consequence of known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, and who have not heretofore been provided for; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. HELMS, LEWIS R. MORRIS, CLAIBORNE, MATTOON, BAILEY, GROVE, and HANNA, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. GREENE moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering so much of the ordinance of the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, (made for the government of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and by an act of Congress, passed on the seventh day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, extended to the Mississippi Territory,) as provides for the establishment of a court of justice, and the appointment of judges by the Government of the United States, within the Mississippi Territory.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. VARNUM, one of the members from the State of Massachusetts, presented a letter enclosed to him, and addressed to the Speaker, from John Avery, Secretary of the said State, accompanying a set of maps, transmitted by direction of the Legislature of Massachusetts, for the use of this House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three;" Whereupon, Ordered, That the said amendments be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred, on the fifth instant, the petition of Hugh Alexander, and others, inhabitants of the State of Kentucky; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said report at the Clerk's table; Whereupon the resolution submitted by the Committee of Ways and Means, to which the Committee of the whole

House reported their agreement, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of Hugh Alexander, and others, presented to this House on the fifth instant, is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

The question was taken, that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Ways and Means do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the sixth instant, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry Messonnier, presented the third of February last; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported to the House their agreement to the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said report at the Clerk's table; Whereupon the resolution submitted by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to which the Committee of the whole House reported their agreement, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That there be paid to Henry Messonnier, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law, the sum of six hundred and fifty dollars and ninety cents, being the amount of duties paid by him on fourteen hogsheads of coffee, imported in the ship Pacareau, Captain Latour, and entered at the port of Baltimore, on the eighteenth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, which sum had also been paid on the same fourteen hogsheads of coffee, by Champaign and Deyme.

The question was taken, that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

Resolved, That the Speaker be requested to acknowledge the acceptance of a set of maps of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which the Secretary of that Commonwealth, by direction of the Legislature thereof, has transmitted for the use of this House.

PURCHASE OF LOUISIANA.

[The injunction of secrecy having been removed from the following proceedings, had in secret session, they are here inserted under the proper date.]

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House, to whom was yesterday committed a motion in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That a sum of two millions of dollars, in addition to the provision heretofore made, be appropriated to defray any expenses which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any money that may be in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who, if necessary, is hereby authorized to borrow the whole or any part thereof; an account whereof, as soon as may be, shall be laid before Congress:"

be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that the motion be referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. DICKSON, Mr. LOWNDES, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. GREGG; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The Committee to whom was referred a resolution proposing an appropriation of two millions of dollars, in addition to the sum usually appropriated for the purposes of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, submit the following report:

X The object of this resolution is to enable the Executive to commence, with more effect, a negotiation with the French and Spanish Governments relative to the purchase from them of the island of New Orleans, and the provinces of East and West Florida. This object is deemed highly important and has received the attentive consideration of the Committee. The free and unmolested navigation of the river Mississippi is a point to which the attention of the General Government has been directed, ever since the peace of 1783, by which our independence as a nation was finally acknowledged. The immense tract of country owned by the United States, which lies immediately on the Mississippi, or communicates with it by means of large navigable rivers rising within our boundaries, renders its free navigation an object, not only of inestimable advantage, but of the very first necessity. The Mississippi forms the western boundary of the United States, from its source to the 31st degree of north latitude, and empties itself into the Gulf of Mexico, about the 29th degree of north latitude. It furnishes the only outlet through which the produce of the Indiana Territory, of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and of the western parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia, and a portion of the Mississippi Territory, can be transported to a foreign market, or to the ports of the Atlantic States. From the 31st degree of north latitude, which is the southern boundary of the United States, to the mouth of the river, the territory on each side has heretofore been in possession of the Spanish Government; the province of Louisiana lying to the West, and those of East Florida, with the island of New Orleans, to the East. Although the United States have insisted on an uncontrollable right to pass up and down the river, from its source to the sea, yet this right, if admitted in its most ample latitude, will not secure to them the full advantages of navigation. The strength and rapidity of the current of the Mississippi are known to render its ascent so extremely difficult, that few vessels of burden have attempted to go as far as our boundary. This circumstance obliges the citizens of the Western country to carry their produce down the river in boats, from which it is put on board of ships capable of sustaining a sea voyage. It follows, therefore, that to enjoy the full benefits of navigation, some place should be fixed which sea vessels can approach without great inconvenience, where the American produce may be deposited until it is again shipped to be carried abroad. This great point was secured to us in the year 1795, by the Spanish Government, who agreed, in the treaty of San Lorenzo el Real, that Americans should have the right to deposit at New Orleans. This right has been used from that time till a late period; but the conduct of the Intendant at that place shows how liable the advantageous navigation of the river is to interruption, and strongly points out the impolicy of relying on a foreign nation for benefits, which our citizens have a right to expect should be secured to them by their own Government. It is hoped that the port of New Orleans may again be opened before any very material injuries arise; but should this be the case, or if, as the treaty provides, a new place of deposit should be assigned, the late occurrence shows the uncertainty of its continuance. Experience proves that the caprice or the interested views of a single officer may perpetually subject us to the alternative of submitting to injury, or of resorting to war.

The late violation of our treaty with Spain necessarily leads to the inquiry, how far the Western country may be affected in other points, not connected with New Orleans? The Mississippi Territory extends from the confines of Georgia to the river Mississippi, and from the 31st to the 35th degree of north latitude. It is estimated to contain more than fifty millions of acres, and, from its numerous advantages, must one day or other possess an immense population. The variety, richness, and abundance of its productions, hold out to settlers the strongest inducements to resort thither, and the United States may safely calculate on drawing a considerable revenue from the sale of lands in this, as well as in other quarters of the Western country. The value of these, however, may be diminished or increased, and the sale impeded or advanced by the impression made on the public mind, by shutting the port of New Orleans, and by eventual measures which may be adopted to guard against similar injuries.

West Florida is bounded on the north by the Mississippi Territory, from which it is separated by no natural boundary; on the east by the river Apalachicola, which divides it from East Florida; on the west by the river Mississippi, and on the south by the Gulf of Mexico. The Mississippi Territory is intersected by many large and valuable rivers, which rise within its own boundaries, and meander through it in a general direction from north to south, but empty themselves into the Gulf of Mexico through the province of West Florida. In fact, with the exception of that part of the Territory which lies immediately on the Mississippi, the whole must depend on the Mobile and the Apalachicola, with their numerous branches, and on some other rivers of inferior note, for the means of sending its produce to market, and of returning to itself such foreign supplies as the necessities or convenience of its inhabitants may require. In these rivers, too, the eastern parts of the State of Tennessee are deeply interested, as some of the great branches of the Mobile approach very near to some of those branches of the Tennessee river, which lie above the great Muscle shoals. Even if it should prove difficult to connect them, yet the land carriage will be shorter, and the route to the sea more direct than the river Tennessee furnishes. These rivers possess, likewise, an advantage which is denied to the Mississippi. As their sources are not in the mountains, and their course is through a level country, their currents are gentle, and the tide flows considerably above our boundary. This circumstance, together with the depth of water, which many of them afford, render them accessible to sea vessels, and ships of two hundred tons burden may ascend for several hundred miles into the heart of the Mississippi Territory. These rivers, however, which run almost exclusively within our own limits, and which it would seem as if nature had intended for our own benefit, we must be indebted to others for the beneficial use of, so long as the province of West Florida shall continue in the possession of a foreign nation. If the province of West Florida were of itself an independent empire, it would be the interest of its Government to promote the freedom of trade, by laying open the mouths of the rivers to all nations; this having been the policy of those Powers who possess the mouths of the Rhine, the Danube, the Po, and the Tagus, with some others. But the system of colonization which has always heretofore prevailed, proves that the mother country is ever anxious to engross to itself the trade of its colonies, and affords us every reason to apprehend that Spain will not readily admit us to pass through her territory to carry on a trade either with each other or with foreign nations. This right we may insist on, and perhaps it may be conceded to us; but it is possible that it may be denied. At all events it may prove the source of endless disagreement and perpetual hostility.

In this respect East Florida may not perhaps be so important, but its acquisition is nevertheless deemed desirable. From its junction with the State of Georgia, at the river St. Mary's, it stretches nearly four hundred miles into the sea, forming a large peninsula, and has some very fine harbors. The southern point, Cape Florida, is not more than one hundred miles distant from the Havana, and the possession of it may be beneficial to us in relation to our trade with the West Indies. It would likewise make our whole territory compact, would add considerably to our seacoast, and by giving us the Gulf of Mexico for our southern boundary, would render us less liable to attack, in what is now deemed the most vulnerable part of the Union.

From the foregoing view of facts, it must be seen that the possession of New Orleans and the Floridas will not only be required for the convenience of the United States, but will be demanded by their most imperious necessities. The Mississippi and its branches, with those other rivers above referred to, drain an extent of country, not less, perhaps, than one-half of our whole territory, containing at this time one-eighth of our population and progressing with a rapidity beyond the experience of any former time, or of any other nation. The Floridas and New Orleans command the only outlets to the sea, and our best interests require that we should get possession of them. This requisition, however, arises not from a disposition to increase our territory; for neither the Floridas nor New Orleans offer any other inducements than their mere geographical relation to the United States. But if we look forward to the free use of the Mississippi, the Mobile, the Apalachicola, and the other rivers of the West, by ourselves and our posterity, New Orleans and the Floridas must become a part of the United States, either by purchase or by conquest.

The great question, then, which presents itself is, shall we at this time lay the foundation for future peace by offering a fair and equivalent consideration; or shall we hereafter incur the hazards and the horrors of war? The Government of the United States is differently organized from any other in the world. Its object is the happiness of man; its policy and its interest, to pursue right by right means. War is the great scourge of the human race, and should never be resorted to but in cases of the most imperious necessity. A wise government will avoid it, when its views can be attained by peaceful measures. Princes fight for glory, and the blood and treasure of their subjects is the price they pay. In all nations the people bear the burden of war, and in the United States the people rule. Their Representatives are the guardians of their rights, and it is the duty of those Representatives to provide against any event which may, even at a distant day, involve the interests and the happiness of the nation. We may, indeed, have our rights restored to us by treaty, but there is a want of fortitude in applying temporary remedies to permanent evils; thereby imposing on our posterity a burden which we ourselves ought to bear. If the purchase can be made, we ought not to hesitate. If the attempt should fail, we shall have discharged an important duty.

War may be the result, but the American nation, satisfied with our conduct, will be animated by one soul, and will unite all its energies in the contest. Foreign Powers will be convinced that it is not a war of aggrandizement on our part, and will feel no unreasonable jealousies towards us. We shall have proved that our object was justice; it will be seen that our propositions were fair; and it will be acknowledged that our cause is honorable. Should alliances be necessary they may be advantageously formed. We shall have merited, and shall therefore possess, general confidence. Our measures will stand justified not only to ourselves and our country, but to the world.

In another point of view, perhaps, it would be preferable to make the purchase, as it is believed that a smaller sum would be required for this subject, than would necessarily be expended, if we should attempt to take possession by force; the expenses of a war being, indeed, almost incalculable. The Committee have no information before them, to ascertain the amount for which the purchase can be made, but it is hoped that, with the assistance of two millions of dollars in hand, this will not be unreasonable. A similar course was pursued for the purpose of settling our differences with the Regency of Algiers, by an appropriation of one million of dollars, prior to the commencement of the negotiation, and we have since experienced its beneficial effects.

Under these impressions, therefore, the Committee recommend the adoption of the resolution referred to them in the following words, viz:

Resolved, That a sum of two millions of dollars, in addition to the provision heretofore made, be appropriated to defray the expenses which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; to be paid out of any money that may be in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States; who, if necessary, is hereby authorized to borrow the same, or any part thereof, an account whereof, as soon as may be, shall be laid before Congress.

THURSDAY, January 13.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM JONES, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of Henry Messonnier; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the seventeenth ultimo, so much of the President's Message as relates "to providing for the return of American seamen discharged in foreign ports, and left abroad," have leave to report thereon, by bill or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. S. SMITH offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of prolonging the period of payment of bonds given for duties by merchants of Portsmouth who may have been sufferers by the late fire at that place.

Mr. S. submitted a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to him, as chairman of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, stating that, if the prolongation depended upon him, he should be inclined to grant it—also enclosing a letter from the Collector of the port of Portsmouth.

The resolution was immediately taken up and agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS, from the committee appointed on the thirty-first ultimo, to whom was referred a petition of sundry inhabitants of the City of Washington, and of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, presented a bill for incorporating an Insurance Company in the City of Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill for the relief of Hugh Alexander, and others; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the amendments offered by the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the Military Establishment for the year 1803.

The first amendment, applying an addition of two thousand dollars for the purchase of books, maps, and instruments, for the use of the War Department, was agreed to.

On the second, adding $4,500 for the payment of postage on letters to and from the inspector, paymaster, &c., a lengthy debate ensued.

The appropriation was opposed by Mr. NICHOLSON and others; in the first place as being unnecessary; for it had been discovered in the course of their examinations at the last session, that a considerable amount appeared on the books of the accountant for the Department of War, as having been expended for the payment of postage on military letters, &c., from the contingent fund—that the same practice could be pursued. By making the grant, twenty per cent., equal to $900, would go into the pocket of the deputy postmaster in this place; which would be that sum drawn from the public Treasury.

It was opposed on another ground—as being the duty of the Secretary of War to frank all letters going from the offices attached to the War Department, and, therefore, an appropriation was unnecessary.

In answer, it was observed, that the Government must, and ought in some way, to support the expense of transporting returns, orders, and letters, relating to the military service; and, if they would not make an appropriation, it was proposed to extend the privilege of franking to the paymaster and inspector, through whom most of the details for the Army passed. That it was not the duty of the Secretary to frank letters and packages going from other offices—it was making a clerk of him—obliging him to do that which neither the law nor the Constitution contemplated as being attached to his office; that it would encroach upon the time which must necessarily be devoted to more important concerns. Besides, were he able and willing to perform the drudgery of that service, it was doubtful whether he had any legal or Constitutional right to frank any packages, except those going immediately and directly from his own particular office, and that he might be liable to a penalty, though he should frank letters on public business, relating to the Army and War Department generally.

The extension of the privilege of franking was opposed by the Speaker, (Mr. MACON,) and others. They considered all franking as wrong, and liable to abuse—they would rather restrict than extend this privilege.

In reply it was said that, if confidence could not be placed in those officers, as to the privilege of franking, the imposition could not be prevented by referring their packets to the Secretary of War, or by paying their account current with the postmasters. It was evident the Government must pay those expenses; that it could make no difference as to the revenue, whether the Postmaster General's Department received and paid to the Treasury the money which was drawn from the contingent fund of the War Department, or from a special appropriation to defray the expenses of postage on military letters and packets, or whether they extended the privilege of franking to those officers from and through whom the military details must pass. In the former case, it was but taking from one pocket and putting in the other—in the latter much trouble was saved; and, if the characters employed in those departments were worthy of a confidence which should entitle them to the places they hold, it could never be supposed that they would abuse the privilege of franking.

On motion of Mr. GRISWOLD, seconded by Mr. EUSTIS, the Committee rose, and the amendments from the Senate were recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. NEWTON, from the committee appointed on the petition of sundry merchants of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Virginia, praying "that amendments might be made to the bankrupt law;" also, instructed by a resolution, offered by Mr. VARNUM, "to inquire into the expediency of repealing an act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,'" made the following report: "That it was not expedient to repeal the bankrupt law."

Mr. SMITH said, if the report was final, he should move that the House now take it into consideration.

JANUARY, 1803.

Bankrupt Law.

H. OF R.

Mr. BAYARD doubted whether it could be final. He supposed, when a subject was referred to a committee, it was proper for them to select a part for their consideration, and make a report in part. If the chairman of that committee thought himself authorized to report in part, he should be satisfied to consider it as such. But as a petition had been presented praying amendments to the bankrupt law, he should have been better pleased if the examination of the committee had extended to that inquiry. He knew that the bankrupt law was not complete, and could not be made unexceptionable in the first attempt: experience alone could mature the subject. He hoped the report would be recommitted; that the same committee might examine the present system, point out the inconveniences, and report their opinion.

Mr. NEWTON said he had made a report in conformity to the positive directions of the select committee. They deemed it improper, when the opinion of the House were divided, that they should go extensively into the examination. When the question of repeal had been decided, then they had contemplated a report relative to amendments. He did not think himself authorized to report in part, without consulting the committee.

Mr. DAWSON moved to erase the word "not." Motion not in order.

A motion was made for the committee to take back the report for the purpose of making another, which should embrace the subject of amendments as well as repeal. Having stated that it was not expedient to repeal, the amendments of which it was capable should have been submitted.

Another argument was offered in favor of a recommitment, viz: that the present was but a report in part; they had not noticed the petition from the merchants of Norfolk and Portsmouth, on which they were first appointed, but had acted upon the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. VARNUM,) which was a point of secondary consideration.

A motion was made that the House now consider the report.—Carried.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the act would not be amended, but repealed. When it passed, he was one of those who entered his protest against it. He considered it in the nature of an ex post facto law—an allurement to fraud—tending to corrupt the morals of the community—to change the nature of contracts—to discharge men, not only from their obligations and their solemn promises, but to violate their oaths. And, because Congress had a right to enact such a law, would gentlemen say it was for the benefit of trade? Its operations had been the reverse. He had been waiting, ever since its establishment, for the merchants themselves to come forward and urge the repeal. A portion of them had petitioned for amendments, which, in fact, amounted to a request for a repeal.

Mr. S. SMITH thought any arguments on the merits of the question were premature. It was a subject of too much importance to be hurried in that manner. He hoped it would be recommitted.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—Many gentlemen appeared to wish a repeal, because there were some injurious provisions in the law; others wished it might be amended, believing it was capable of such alterations as would remove their objections. He thought it in some respects defective, and in others beneficial. If the evils to which it was subjected could be remedied, he should be for retaining, if not, for repealing the law.

Mr. SMILIE.—Considering the situation of the United States, he thought there never should have been a bankrupt law; but he doubted whether it would be expedient to repeal it at this time, but let it expire of itself. He believed much mischief had been produced by it, and if it was repealed now, he apprehended much more would ensue. Its natural life was but five years, and he thought it had better exist for that period than be repealed. He was for recommitment.

Mr. BAYARD agreed with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) and thought the committee should have inquired what amendments were expedient. He was also forcibly impressed with the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) that it was better to suffer the law to expire of itself than repeal it now. He did not think that the House were prepared to go into a discussion. The argument of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that the bankrupt law was ex post facto, would not apply; but an act to repeal would in reality be an ex post facto law. Many merchants had entered into contracts, having an eye to the bankrupt law; many had embarked in perilous enterprises, knowing, that if they had made unfortunate calculations, that by a surrender of their effects they might again engage in commercial pursuits. And though a man might be discharged from his contracts, the sense of moral obligation was not impaired—in foro conscientie he was still answerable. He would not deny that frauds were committed, but for this should the honest debtor be eternally fettered with his debts? Should he, from unavoidable accidents, be cast into prison, and his family reduced to misery and distress? He was sure that the gentleman would revolt at the idea. Were the bankrupt law repealed, they must substitute the insolvent laws of the different States. Did not the insolvent laws of the Southern States hold out the same allurements to fraud as the general bankrupt law? By a repeal, they would increase the evils, and destroy the benefits of the general system. We were, said Mr. B., a great commercial Republic; the connexion between merchants of the different States was increasing; therefore, the merchant of Georgia and the merchant of New Hampshire should be subjected to general regulations. Now, the merchant of Pennsylvania trusting the merchant of Virginia knew that his whole estate, real and personal, was liable for the payment of his debts; whereas, by the insolvent laws of that State, (Virginia,) the former might give an extensive credit; the latter might vest it all in land, which was untangible for the payment of his demand. The bankrupt act was a commercial law, extending equal benefits throughout the Union. If it was suffered to go back to the select committee, they would be able to give a clearer view of its advantages and defects. It was a subject of incalculable importance, both as it respected the debtor and creditor, and he hoped it would meet a candid and deliberate investigation.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that the affairs of the world had been found to suffer more from being put in the hands of those who were superior to the management of them, than from those who were inadequate to the execution of those objects entrusted to them. It had been allowed a sound rule of construction, that all general powers must be confined to particular exceptions. The Constitution gave Congress the right of making a bankrupt law, but it did not give the power of impairing contracts. He would exonerate the person, but never the property. It was the case in Virginia, when a man had surrendered all his property, his person was liberated, but his property never. And, though we were a commercial Republic, was it not necessary to take care of the agricultural interest? How did the bankrupt law operate upon the planter? He knew by experience that it had been in many instances ruinous; that many planters had been choused out of their property by the operations of this very law. He had known from experience that many men had been buoyed up and supported by their friends till those friends were made good, and then suffered to fail, to the great injury of the former.

Mr. BACON was in favor of a reference to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. S. SMITH said, gentlemen seemed to consider the bankrupt law as made entirely for the benefit of the debtor. That was an erroneous opinion. It was made also for the creditor: as such he advocated it. It enabled the creditor to secure his property, if he found the debtor was disposed to be fraudulent: he could apply for a commission of bankruptcy, and make the debtor account for the property in his possession. Besides, it reduced the creditors to an equality—a debtor could not secure his friends, and leave the rest of his creditors without a dollar. An instance of that kind had lately come within his knowledge. To the agricultural interest it held out still greater advantages. The farmer who brought his produce to market could always get cash, if he would sell for cash; if he chose to sell on a credit, he received a higher price in proportion; that increase of price was his insurance for selling on credit. He was for examining the subject, and endeavoring to remedy defects, rather than repealing.

Mr. HOLLAND moved that it be referred to a Committee of the whole House. Carried.

A motion was made that it be referred to Monday next; another for Monday week.

Mr. MITCHILL moved for Monday, the 31st inst.

Mr. THATCHER hoped the longest period proposed would be adopted.

The House divided, when the motion of Mr. MITCHILL prevailed—ayes 30, nays 29.

FRIDAY, January 14.

Mr. VAN NESS, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," passed the third day of May, one thousand eight hundred and two; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. VAN NESS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to lay out and open a new public road in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. VAN NESS moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a monument be erected in commemoration of the patriotism, valor, and good conduct of Major General Horatio Gates, who, in the late Revolutionary War, commanded the American forces that captured General Burgoyne and the British army under his command, at Saratoga, in the State of New York.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the committee to whom was committed, on the tenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to carry into effect several resolutions of Congress for erecting monuments to the memories of the late Generals Wooster, Harkness, Davidson, and Scriven."

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the relief of persons who are disabled by wounds received in the service of the United States, be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for the settlement of claims for services rendered, and supplies furnished during the Revolutionary War.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were directed by a resolution of this House of the thirteenth instant, "to inquire into the expediency of prolonging the terms of payment on bonds due by such merchants who may have been sufferers in the late fire at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire;" made a report thereon, which was read, and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to prepare and report a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to suspend, for a limited time, the collection of bonds due to the United States by merchants of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, who have suffered by the late conflagration of that town.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee last mentioned, presented a bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth, which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House, on Monday next.

IMPORTATION OF ARMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on Mr. RUTLEDGE's resolution to exempt States importing arms for the use of their militia, from the payment of duties thereon.

On this resolution an interesting debate ensued, which continued till near four o'clock.

Those who advocated the resolution were Messrs. RUTLEDGE, MACON, LOWNDES, BAYARD, NICHOLSON, DENNIS, HUGER, BUTLER, and GRISWOLD.

JANUARY, 1803.

Importation of Arms.

H. OF R.

Those who opposed it, were Messrs. DAWSON, RANDOLPH, BACON, EUSTIS, MATTOON, HOLLAND, and MITCHILL.

The friends of the resolution supported it principally upon general principles; notwithstanding its origination in the peculiar circumstances in which South Carolina was placed by the purchase of arms abroad, and which she was about importing. They declared the arming of the militia of the United States an object of the utmost importance; an object not only recommended by the ordinary situation of the country, but likewise enforced by the peculiar crisis of affairs. The militia had been correctly denominated the natural defence of the nation, and alone could render a standing army unnecessary. A celebrated writer had truly pronounced an armed nation invincible; and when arms should be put universally into the hands of our militia, the United States would be an armed nation. As these sentiments were indisputable, and as a state of affairs existed not of the most pleasant nature, as there was no knowing the moment when our most vulnerable points might be attacked, inducements to the adoption of the resolution, of a temporary were superadded to those of a permanent complexion.

Two objections only were urged against the adoption of the resolution; the first, that thereby a diminution of revenue might be experienced; the second, that it withdrew a legitimate and necessary protection from the domestic manufacture of arms. With regard to the first objection, it was alleged to have but very little weight. The quantum of revenue derived from the importation of arms was insignificant; and it appeared by documents on the table that in the years 1799, 1800, and 1801, not a dollar had been received from this source. So trifling a sacrifice, therefore, as this consideration involved, was unworthy the regard of the Legislature in competition with the immense object of arming our militia. A good militia system had always been considered as a great desideratum, and had accordingly engaged, every session, the attention of the Legislature. But it was believed that until arms were exclusively put into the hands of our citizens, no effectual provision could be accomplished; whereas, with arms in their hands, they would be competent, under State regulations, to the complete defence of the country.

Under the Constitution of the United States, it did not appear to be the duty of the States to arm the militia; that duty was at best equivocal; as the object was national, it might perhaps, most correctly, be considered as the duty of the General Government. It was certainly the interest of that Government that the militia should be armed; and it would also be the evidence of a wise and magnanimous policy to grant the reasonable requests of the States; particularly when a gratification of such requests would promote not only the general harmony, but also the national strength. The removal of the duty, it was observed, would, in the proportion of fifteen to a hundred, increase the ability of the States to purchase arms; for which this was a season the most auspicious, and which ought therefore immediately to be seized. An immense mass of arms had been employed during the late European war; and on the restoration of peace, which now pervaded Europe, a large portion of them becoming unnecessary, were carried into the market; the consequence of which was the reduction of their price much below the war price. This, then, was the season for purchase, which ought to be improved without delay, as there was no foreseeing the hour at which new hostilities might burst out in that quarter, and as it was ascertained from experience, that during a state of war, the exportation of arms was prohibited; which might be that period when they would be most wanted by this country.

The militia were, it was remarked, in most of the States but miserably supplied with arms; and this was most particularly the case in the Southern States. Should the nation, contrary to their wishes, be engaged in war, it was these States that would experience the first attack of an invading enemy; and in such event, as the ultimate defence must rest upon the national Government, it would then be perceived that even the revenue would in effect be aided, in case the facility thereby given the States to procure arms should have, by the removal of this duty, rendered unnecessary the interposition of the Federal Government. By limiting it to two years, a stimulus would be given to the States, as well as an intimation of the sense of the General Government of the importance of immediately attending to this interesting object.

It was asked, whether it was proper to tax the militia that the revenue might be aided? It would be better even to tax the bread of life, than the arms of the militia, because those arms were necessary to enable our citizens to eat that bread in peace.

With regard to the second objection made to the resolution, that it would depress, if not destroy, the domestic manufacture of arms, it was replied, that even if such should be the effect, in a case of such infinite importance the lesser evil should be submitted to, rather than lose the greater benefit. It was acknowledged that the protection of domestic manufactures was a great object, and especially the manufacture of arms; but it was declared to be the result of all experience in Europe, that the private manufacture of arms must be abandoned in times of peace. Governments, mindful of this necessary effect, had established national armories. Such ought to be the policy of the United States, as well as the giving a bounty in time of peace, on the domestic manufacture, even if that bounty exceeded the market price one hundred per cent. The effect, however, ascribed to the renewal of this duty, was denied; and it was alleged that the present price of imported arms was so low, notwithstanding the existing duty, that the domestic manufacturer could not enter into competition with the importer.

With regard to protecting duties, they had, in many cases, been laid, and correctly laid, on articles, such as hats, boots, and shoes, where the ability of the manufacturers was equal to the demand ; but in the article of arms this was manifestly not the fact ; nor was it believed, considering our increasing population, that it would be the case for twenty years.

On the other hand, the opponents of the resolution remarked that it presented simply a question of money. Notwithstanding the eloquence with which it had been urged, it was extrinsic from the great points introduced to buoy it up. It had really nothing to do with the important object of arming the militia. Every member on the floor knew and felt the infinite magnitude of that object ; but the difference of opinion entertained, respected not the end, but the means of accomplishing it. In two views the resolution was exceptionable ; first, as it would affect the revenue ; and secondly, as it would affect the domestic manufacture of arms. The first consideration was entitled to some weight, though it was allowed that, if any great good could be proved as likely to result from the removal of the duty, the force of the objection would be weakened ; nor would this argument in such event be adhered to. But the second effect calculated to be produced by the adoption of the resolution, was conclusive against it. At a time when the domestic manufacture of arms required the fostering hand of Government, it was proposed, contrary to every principle of justice, and subversive of every suggestion of policy, to remove an existing duty on imported arms, and thereby effectually to prostrate the domestic manufacture of them. The duty had been imposed long since, and effects eminently beneficial had resulted from it. The manufacture of arms among ourselves had been cherished and extended.

Our dependence for this important article no longer rested upon foreign supply. Many respectable manufactories had been established, and our citizens been enabled to enter into competition with importers of arms. This effect had been produced during the late European war, when the price of arms, from the great demand, was high. Now, when that price was reduced, and when the domestic manufacturer could scarcely compete with the European price superadded to the duty, it is proposed still further to aggravate his situation, and to withdraw his only protection ; that protection which had allured him into the manufacture, and the unjust removal of which might issue in his ruin and the destruction of the whole domestic manufacture. It was proposed to suspend the exaction of the duty for two years. This would effectually prostrate the domestic fabric of arms, and after that period we might in vain seek the manufacturer elsewhere than in the records of the bankrupt law. Thus at the very moment when our domestic manufacture of arms required the most protection, it was attempted to remove all protection, whatever. Who, it was asked, would, under such harsh circumstances, ever hereafter undertake this vital fabric ? But it was alleged that an allowance of the importation of arms, duty free, would be attended with a great present benefit. Even allowing this might be the case, which however was questionable, was it the policy of the Government to sacrifice a great ultimate advantage to a temporary good ?

Every nation ought to have those resources on which her existence depended within herself. Of this nature was the manufacture of arms. Regard ought not exclusively to be paid to the present period. Periods of equal, of greater danger might hereafter arrive, when it would not be in our power to import arms ; and when, consequently, our reliance must be on ourselves. Was it therefore politic, now, to take a step that would crush our infant manufactures ? The fabrication of arms, too, was not to be learned in a day. Was it then wise to give up all the experience we had gained ?

It was further contended that the abrogation of duty at this late day would operate injuriously, if not unjustly, to those States who, under greater difficulties than at present existed, had made patriotic purchases of arms. Many of these purchases had been at prices three-fold the existing price. Would not the removal of the duty, therefore, operate as an indirect tax upon the citizens of those States who had manifested the greatest exertions to obtain arms, while it operated as a bounty upon those who had displayed the least ? These exertions had been most vigorously made in the Eastern States. Would it be said that they were richer or more able to defray the expense than the Southern States ? The fact was that the respectable State of South Carolina, and the other Southern States, were fully able to pay the duty, and if they entertained a zealous disposition to arm their militia the duty would be no obstacle. In the Eastern States the militia were armed. There individuals had purchased arms at an enormous expense. In a state of real or apprehended danger, what had there been the conduct of the people ? They had bought arms, and turned out, and submitted to heavy burdens. In another part of the Union, it might not be just to say the people were asleep ; but the fact was they had not armed or turned out. Is it fair, then, or just, to tax those who have been so vigilant, and have borne such heavy burdens, to relieve those who have been supine and have borne but little burden ? Is not this in effect a tax upon the necessities of life, upon the bread of the poor ? This would indeed be a dreadful discouragement to those who have most exerted themselves in a period of danger.

An argument in favor of the abrogation of the duty had been drawn from the suspension of it some time since. But that argument was entitled to little weight ; then the price abroad was so high, that, even abating the duty, our manufacturers could keep up a competition with the importer ; whereas the reverse was now the case.

It was added, that if this resolution were meant to secure the internal defence of the country, and it were calculated to have that effect, it did not extend far enough ; but ought to embrace lead, ammunition, gunpowder, and flints. The circumstances under which the motion was made were extraordinary. The United States had removed the land tax, and all other direct taxes, by which the States and their citizens were liberated from heavy burdens previously existing ; and yet at this time an attempt is made to diminish the only remaining source of taxation—external duties. The question was, merely, whether the United States or South Carolina should pay this duty. South Carolina being better able to pay it, the answer was ready. Besides, if the duty should be remitted in this instance, justice required that it should also be remitted in all other cases in which it had been paid; and this was a measure which the advocates of the resolution would not probably favor. As to cannon, they could be made cheaper at home than abroad. The State of New York had established a foundry in Connecticut. South Carolina might do the same.

JANUARY, 1803.

H. OF R.

The question was then taken on the amendment, limiting the suspension of the duty to two years, and carried—yeas 38, nays 33.

Mr. S. SMITH moved to insert "brass" before "ordnance." Agreed to.

Mr. S. then moved to strike out the word "fire," from which it would result that all arms except muskets would be exempt from duty. Mr. S. said he would not detain the House at that late hour. He only rose to enter his protest against the ideas of some gentlemen, who had expressed the opinion that there should be no protecting duties. He believed if all protecting duties were taken off, the effect would be a destruction of our manufactures. He hoped, before the House rose, that subject would be brought forward, and seriously attended to.

Mr. NICHOLSON had heard no gentleman say, there ought to be no protecting duties. He had himself said they ought not to be laid on articles of the first necessity, when the manufacturers of the country were not competent to supply the demand.

A motion was made that the Committee should rise, and ask leave to sit again. Carried—yeas 48.

The Committee accordingly rose, and on granting leave to sit again, the House divided—yeas 34, nays 25.

MONDAY, January 17.

Two other members, to wit: from Virginia SAMUEL J. CABELL, and from North Carolina ROBERT WILLIAMS, appeared and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States during one year, prior to the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and two; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of sundry inhabitants of the town of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina, was presented to the House and read, stating that a certain number of negroes or mulattoes, to whom emancipation has been granted by the Executive of the French Government in the Island of Guadaloupe, had been recently landed at the said town of Wilmington; that, in the opinion of the memorialists, much danger to the peace and safety of the people of the Southern States of the Union in particular, is justly to be apprehended from the admission of persons of that description into the United States, from the West India Islands; and praying that Congress will be pleased to take the premises into consideration, and adopt such effectual measures for prevention thereof, as they in their wisdom may deem proper.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. HILL, Mr. EARLY, Mr. HUGER, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. CAMPBELL, to report their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed on the seventh instant, "to consider whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the Military Establishment of the United States, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. EUSTIS made some remarks on the impropriety of vesting the President of the United States with the revocation, at pleasure, of the commissions of militia officers in the District of Columbia; and moved the appointment of a committee to revise the act by which that system is authorized. Ordered to lie on the table.

IMPORTATION OF ARMS.

Mr. RUTLEDGE's resolution, that any State importing arms for the use of their militia should receive the same free of duty, was resumed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LEIB called the attention of the Committee to a petition which he had presented from sundry manufacturers of arms in the city of Philadelphia which was then referred to the same committee. The petition was read.

Mr. BACON.—Gentlemen seemed to believe that the duty on arms amounted to a prohibition of imports. A gentleman from South Carolina had told them that their militia were badly armed; that they would be obliged to purchase; at all events, that they were desirous of being armed. What was the reason of their remaining so long in that situation, when at the same time they do not want money, and when arms are so plenty in Europe that they can be purchased at a lower rate, and pay the duty, than they can be manufactured at home? That was unintelligible to him, though it might be explained away to his satisfaction.

Some gentlemen, he perceived, thought it good policy to encourage manufactures, particularly that of money, and would support a mint at the expense of many thousand dollars, but were very unwilling to encourage the manufacture of arms, though it should bring money into the country. He did not consider the manufacture of money of so much advantage, as that of arms, for we could at all times import money, even in war, but we could not always get arms. Should there be a deficiency of money we could always substitute a credit. But a credit would be a poor substitute for arms.

He was very unwilling to infringe on the impost, that great source of revenue. When they once began, they would not know where to stop. He was the more averse to that step, when he recollected the strong attempt to weaken it at the last session. He considered the resolution a dangerous one—it was calculated to reduce the treasury; if adopted it might serve as an entering wedge to go further. Gentlemen might then come forward again, and paint in glowing colors the necessity of relieving the lower classes of people, by taking off the duty on salt, bohea tea, and brown sugar, from which we received an immense revenue. We had never heard any complaint of the duty on arms before; therefore, why should we break in upon our system of revenue?

Mr. NICHOLSON could not see what connexion the present subject had with the Mint. If he understood the gentleman, he would not have us preserve the Mint, because money might always be procured, and yet he would not have us import arms, though they could not always be obtained. [Here Mr. BACON explained. He did not mean to be understood in that way; but that there was a prospect of our being able at all times to command money.] Mr. N. believed he understood the gentleman's meaning. This, he said, was the moment in which arms could be imported with advantage, and we ought to embrace it. Nor could he see the connexion between the importation of arms, and the duty on salt, coffee, and bohea tea. Those observations might have been intended for other gentlemen, but he felt them. He was in favor of the resolution; he thought we ought to import arms; there was a necessity for them. By taking the duty from salt, &c., we deduct an immense sum from our revenues; but, for the last three years, not one dollar has been derived from the importation of arms. A law was passed in 1797 for taking off the duty on arms, which was to continue one year, and on examining the journals he could not find one dissenting voice. Then there was supposed to be danger. There was always danger existing, said Mr. N., as strong as at that time, in the Southern States. They were always exposed to an internal enemy; and it was of the highest importance that their militia should be armed: not to meet a foreign enemy, not to meet an invading foe; but that they might be able to defend themselves against every description of enemies, and to prevent the necessity of a standing army; for without the militia were rendered capable of defence, an army must be supported. He believed the question was to strike out the word "fire" before "arms." He should oppose the amendment, but was in favor of the resolution.

Mr. BACON said, the gentleman had a good faculty of answering arguments which were never made for him; they were intended to apply as they were expressed.

Mr. RUTLEDGE hoped the motion made by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) to strike out the word "fire" before the word "arms," would not prevail. By the motion, the main object of the resolution would be frustrated. It was known that they were more in want of fire-arms than any other. In the course of the debate, much had been said of the benefit which would result to South Carolina from the passage of the resolution. It contemplated a privilege to all the States of importing arms free of duty; besides, if it were to continue but two years it would hold out an inducement to do it shortly. The fact is, that the State of South Carolina would not be much injured, were fire-arms excluded from the privilege. But that was taking a limited view. He wished New Hampshire, Vermont, and all the States, North and South, to be supplied. The militia of Massachusetts were good; and why were they superior to the militia of other States? Because they were well armed. But that was not the case generally. It was not so in Virginia, and the States south of it. Some gentlemen said there was no danger now; whenever it did arrive, measures would be taken. Let the attention of those gentlemen be called to the year 1797, when danger was apprehended—Congress passed a law prohibiting exportations of arms, and exempted from duty those imported.

Those encouragements would always be given when there was a necessity for them, but it should be recollected that in time of danger they could not always be imported, being contraband of war. From the peace in Europe, and the disbandment of large armies, warlike implements of every description must be plenty and cheap. He had been told that muskets were lately imported for five dollars each. But a few years ago, they could not have been had for ten. It therefore seems to present a fortunate period for arming and equipping our militia. But, on the broad ground of policy, we should speedily accomplish this object. Our foreign relations were not in the most eligible situation; it was well to let the nations of Europe see that we were prepared for any event—that, although, we were willing to accommodate differences by the milder mode of negotiation, we had the power to protect our rights, and the spirit to revenge unmerited injuries.

The question was taken to strike out the word "fire," and lost—25 only in the affirmative.

Mr. VARNUM did not know whether the resolution would admit of an amendment which he would offer. He thought if the States were permitted to import free from duty, that companies and individual merchants should have the same privilege. Many States at the Eastward were not well armed, and he believed they would not be as a State; but that individuals might import, and the citizens would purchase from them.

Mr. RUTLEDGE had no objection to that amendment of the resolution; but he would submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. VARNUM,) whether it might not now be passed in its present shape, and the amendment inserted in the bill when it was brought in.

Mr. SMILIE said, if the only effect of such a law would be its operation on the funds, he should favor its adoption; he considered the trifling loss of revenue which would result from it as mere matter of moonshine, but he believed it would not only injure, but destroy our own manufactures. The State of Pennsylvania had been obliged to purchase at the rate of ten dollars for a musket and bayonet; the American manufacturers now offer the same, or better, for nine dollars and a half. He should oppose the resolution.

The yeas and nays were called for by Mr. HUGER, and the question lost—yeas 41, nays 43.

On motion, the Committee rose, and reported their disagreement to the resolution.

Moved that the House now consider the report of the Committee of the Whole; when,

Mr. DAVIS said he was surprised that gentlemen had any objections to the resolution. Little or no revenue arose from importations; the manufacturers could not supply sufficient quantities, and all were anxious to arm the militia. He had listened with great attention, but had not heard one sound argument offered against it. Perhaps gentlemen had reasons which they choose to keep behind the curtain, if so, he could not bring them to light. The Constitution obliges Congress to provide for arming the militia, and for general defence. If it is the duty of the United States to arm the militia, and an individual State will do it herself, we ought not to prevent, but encourage the undertaking. Sir, said Mr. D., the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) has not told us whether the manufactory in Virginia is sufficient to arm his own State, much more that of others. If our armories cannot supply the country, and the States will furnish themselves, let them do it. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) gave us a speech a few days since quite in military style. Since the gentleman has gone so far out of his usual course, benefits might result if he would pursue a little further. He had been surprised at the opposition of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH;) unless his authority was to be doubted, the Executive is now about sending an Envoy Extraordinary to a foreign nation to negotiate a settlement of existing differences; and in this situation the Southern and Western States are without the means of defence. What had been done since the commencement of the session? It was all contained in a trifling piece of paper, in the shape and under the title of a resolution. [Mr. RANDOLPH's resolution in secret committee.] Perhaps gentlemen depended on that, as the Children of Israel did upon the law of Moses, for protecting their country! What the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMITH) had said amounted to nothing, except that the State of Pennsylvania had made a hard bargain—that she had purchased when arms were high. It must, however, be an agreeable reflection to him to know that they had arms in possession, and if more were wanted they were now to be obtained cheaper. Gentlemen would tell us all was not well, and yet deny the means of defence! He had been about to ask for arms for the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, but the fate of that resolution had discouraged him. And what, he asked, are the people of the Western country to fight with? Were they to fight with clubs and bludgeons, or were they to assume the antediluvian mode of fighting, with bows, arrows, javelins, and spears? Or were they to put up with insults and injuries against which they could make no resistance?

Mr. CLAIBORNE was in favor of the resolution. Though Virginia had made her contracts, and established her manufactories, they were full handed. If she was likely to be armed, he wished the other States to be furnished also. He was sorry he could not agree with his colleague, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) but in that case he could not think with him, and therefore must vote against him.

Mr. HILL said arguments had been drawn from a variety of sources; from the revenue, from the manufactures, and from the importance of arming the militia. He was a friend to manufactures, but he thought the present question related to the encouragement of importations of arms, for the important purpose of equipping our militia. In addition to the cloud which had appeared from the westward, he had presented a petition that morning which gave reason for unpleasant apprehension from another quarter. He believed the same principle, which would not encourage the importation of arms for those States now destitute, would encourage those who had arms to sell them.

Mr. SOUTHARD was not a little surprised that gentlemen considered the duties as amounting to a prohibition of importations. It is now known that arms can be imported, duties included, as cheap, if not under the rate for which they can be purchased at home. By encouraging importations, we introduced an evil not merely of a temporary nature. While we were not certain that the States would import—indeed we were told that some would not—by taking off the duty we should discourage the manufactures in those States where they had been established, for the express purpose of arming themselves, and individual establishments would be entirely destroyed. The effect on manufactures was important, but on the revenue it was nothing. It was desirable to procure arms, but rather than throw obstacles in the way of our own manufactures, we ought to give a bounty to encourage them. There was every probability that we should be supplied by the manufactures of our country. A large manufactory was now established at Harper's Ferry; there were also many in the arsenals. It discovered an instability in the Government; it was calculated to destroy that confidence which our citizens had a right to repose in them. He would rather discourage importations, and support our own manufactures. He should, therefore, oppose the resolution.

Mr. MERIWETHER thought the great question was, whether it was necessary to arm the militia? If necessary, could they be armed within a reasonable time from our own manufactures? He believed they could not in the course of five, six, or seven years. In the four Southern States, there was a deficiency of one hundred and forty thousand, and even in Massachusetts five thousand five hundred. He did not imagine that the manufactures of our country would furnish the number necessary for the United States, within seven years from that period. In the year 1797, a law was passed in Georgia, and money appropriated, for the purchase of arms; the Governor reported that he had applied to every manufacturer in the United States and could obtain none. It was now important to the Southern States to be armed; they were always exposed. Besides the infringement on the free navigation of the Mississippi, they were exposed from other causes. It was of the first importance to arm the militia, and as the importation of arms free of duty must be one inducement, he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH made a few remarks, that the question was not for arming the militia, or whether the States should be encouraged to arm them. It was for taking off the duty. As he understood, a State (South Carolina) had made an order for arms, and wished to receive them, duty free; by passing the resolution not a single arm more would be brought into the United States. He was not opposed to arming the militia, but in favor of it, and for encouraging manufactures.

Mr. THATCHER.—So extensive a range has been taken in discussing this question, that it cannot be necessary to follow the advocates of the resolution through the various subjects which have been introduced in the course of debate. The arguments in favor of this resolution are predicated upon the idea that we are at the eve of a war; that the country is in imminent danger. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS) draws a conclusion to this effect, from recent measures of the Executive. Sir, I would resort to the same high authority to support an opinion directly opposite. The measures of the Executive have certainly been pacific in the highest degree. Judging from the communications of the President to this House, I should apprehend no immediate danger. We are told, in the Message of the 15th of December, that "we are still blessed with peace and friendship abroad," and there is not the most distant information of approaching hostility. The same gentleman seems dissatisfied that the House has confined itself to a short and ineffectual resolution respecting New Orleans and the Mississippi; with respect to that resolution, I am by no means inclined to differ from him in opinion; but when, sir, it is said that there is an immediate prospect of war, I confess I do not see the evidence. On the contrary, it is understood that we are about to commence a negotiation which, perhaps, years may not terminate.

Gentlemen in favor of this resolution have dwelt at great length, and with great emphasis, upon the necessity of arming the militia. To arm and equip the militia is certainly an object of the greatest importance. On this opinion the House appears unanimous. But, sir, this subject I consider totally unconnected with the question before us, for the militia will be armed if the impost should be continued. The gentleman from Virginia has so fully expressed my ideas upon this point that I shall not trouble the House with a repetition.

The question before the House is simply whether we will permit the individual States to import arms free from the duty of 15 per cent. imposed by law. Sir, the effect which this resolution must have upon the manufacture of arms in the United States, I think an unanswerable objection. I consider this manufacture essential to our safety. It is said that arms can be imported cheaper than we can make them. Taking that statement as correct, are we to be guided in that instance by a strict exactness of pecuniary calculation? To import these articles, which can be had from abroad much cheaper than they can be made at home, may be a good general principle; but the articles enumerated in this resolution are certainly to be excepted. In the Revolution, the independence of this country was hazarded for want of the manufacture of arms. It is possible that we may again be exposed to similar difficulty. An emergency may occur when we cannot resort to Europe for arms; it may exist at a time when their exportation from Europe is prohibited. Surely, then, it is unsafe; it is disgraceful to a great nation, possessing within itself every article necessary for the manufacture of arms in the greatest abundance, to depend on distant countries for a supply. Sir, the resolution tends directly to destroy all our establishments of this kind. The duty no doubt was imposed with a view to their encouragement. If Government should extend its fostering hand to any class of citizens in particular, the manufacturers of arms should be among the first objects of its care. This manufacture already declines; to encourage the importation of arms will be to decree its destruction.

But, sir, it is said that we do not possess the means of making the quantity of arms necessary for the present demand. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MERIWETHER) has insisted upon this objection. Sir, I see no great demand for arms. Gentlemen have told us that none have been imported for several years. But if the demand were great, we know there are several factories of this kind in the United States where they may be made in almost any quantity, equal in every respect to the best which are made in Europe. They certainly can be made before, in all probability, we shall have any pressing occasion for their use. But, sir, if the laws respecting the impost upon these articles are fluctuating, if we impose high duties upon imported arms, when few are wanted, and suspend or repeal those duties as soon as they are in demand, it will soon be true that none can be made in the country. But, admitting that a certain quantity must at this time be imported, where is the necessity of suspending the duties? Have we such a surplus of revenue that we can afford to diminish our impost? If, sir, we are soon to be involved in war, policy would seem to require, that we should not diminish the ordinary revenue. But, say gentlemen, this will not affect the revenue, because no arms have been imported for a long time. Surely argument is not necessary to prove that this application would not have been made unless arms are to be imported, and if they are imported free of duty it must occasion a great loss of revenue.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution under consideration originates in an application from South Carolina to be exempt from the duties imposed by law upon certain arms which that State is about to import.

JANUARY, 1803.

Importation of Arms.

H. OF R.

Sir, this exemption would operate with extreme inequality. Some of the States are well armed, while others are almost destitute of arms. Those States which have been most prompt to arm their militia, have paid the duty; while those which have neglected to the present time to arm, will derive great advantage from that neglect. Besides, sir, why should we grant indulgence to States, which we deny to individuals? In some of the States arms are not imported by the State governments. In Massachusetts, the soldier is obliged to arm himself; and, although we find that the militia of that State are better armed than any other in the Union, those arms have been bought at a much higher price than these which are to be imported into South Carolina will cost, with the addition of impost. The gentleman from that State informs us that muskets can be purchased at seven dollars in Europe; by adding the duty to that sum, we find that they would cost very little more than eight dollars, which is much less than the price at which arms have been purchased by the soldiers in other States. Can it then be supposed that the 15 per cent. duty will deter the State of South Carolina, or any other State, from importing arms, which they consider so necessary at the moment?

But, sir, I think it demonstrable, that it will be ultimately cheaper to purchase arms made in this country. The muskets and other arms for sale in Europe, at the close of a war, especially those of low price, are generally unfit for service. It is stated by an honorable member of this House, that muskets have lately been imported into Rhode Island, and there sold at four or five dollars, duty included. Sir, of what description must those muskets be? They must be refuse arms; dear at any price. Suppose we encourage the militia to import these arms from different parts of Europe, what will be the consequence? Out of thousands we should scarcely find hundreds fit for regular troops, or for any operations of an army; we should find them defective in every respect, and so unequal in calibre that it would cause infinite trouble to fit them with cartridges. On the contrary, those made in this country are allowed to be superior in every respect to any manufactured in Europe. We are told, sir, by the petition on the table, that they can be afforded at nine dollars and fifty cents. I presume if these manufacturers were employed to make them in large quantities, they could be offered for less, for the price must bear some proportion to the quantity in demand. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. VARNUM had a wish to encourage manufactures; but did gentlemen think it possible that they could supply the deficiency of arms? In Virginia, the enrolled militia amounted to 60,000, and they returned but 6,530 arms. [Mr. RANDOLPH said the return was incorrect, both as to men and arms.] If they have more, said Mr. V., he was glad of it. But the return ought to have been correct; it was transmitted by the Adjutant General of the State to the Secretary of War. It had been said that there was a deficiency in Massachusetts of 5,000; in that estimate the non-commissioned officers had not been included, which would make a deficiency of 9,000, and they had little short of 60,000 militia. If the resolution was partial, take off the duty from importations, and give a bounty to your manufacturers. He would not throw any obstacle in the way of their prosperity.

Mr. S. SMITH was unwilling to enter into the debate, which had been extended to a great length already; but a few remarks seemed necessary. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS) had not heard any reasons against the resolution; although many had been offered which seemed to have some effect on the House, they did not affect him. He had asked in what manner they were to fight in the Southern States? were they to fight with clubs, or should they adopt the ante-diluvian mode of fighting? Mr. S. did not know what was the ante-diluvian mode of fighting. The gentleman had shown his knowledge of the Bible, too. He believed the gentleman had read that Holy Book oftener than himself. In 1797, the duty was taken off; but few arms were imported, and he could not conceive the great benefit that would arise from an exemption now, for, if what had been said was true, arms could be imported cheaper than they could be made here, beside paying duty. He was not surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS) would not encourage manufactures; he had never known him to favor them. M. S. was willing that such articles should be imported free, as we could not manufacture, but no other. There could be no want of arms; let the States contract with manufacturers; there were many establishments which made a number daily. Besides, the President, by a law of 1798, was authorized to distribute 30,000 stand of arms, to different parts of the Union, agreeable to their returns, whenever they were wanted.

It was good policy to encourage the manufacturers of arms in time of peace; for then they never would be wanted in time of war. But the moment that resolution passed, the manufacturers of arms must become manufacturers of horse shoes. It was preferable to give more for arms made in our own country; for, in addition to their being better, there was a satisfaction in encouraging our own manufacturers, in giving bread to our own laborers, and the money was expended among our own citizens.

Mr. EUSTIS made a few observations against the resolution; that there was no necessity of encouraging importations, either for arms or ordnance. There were foundries in the Eastern States, which had produced brass pieces for the field equal to any in the world. These manufactures should be protected; they were established at a great expense; the proprietors had taken boys into the foundries, who, in a few years, would become artists; by encouraging these establishments, manufacturers were growing up with their country. Another evil would arise from importation—the arms were not all of the same description, of equal calibre; perhaps there were gentlemen in the House who could recollect many disasters arising from that circumstance in the Revolutionary war. He was one who could bear witness. He saw no benefit, but many evils would result from the passage of the resolution.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved an amendment to extend the time to two years, and to the end of the next session of Congress.—Carried.

Mr. G. also moved to insert the word "brass" before the word "ordnance."—Carried.

Mr. VARNUM said he should vote against the resolution unless the exemption from duty was extended to individuals.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he had before stated that he had no objections to the amendment, but supposed it might as well be inserted in the bill.

Mr. NICHOLSON.—If they extended the exemption from duty to individuals, they should restrict the importations, as they would become an article of exportation; that however might be the subject of amendment to the bill.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, at the request of Mr. STANLEY—yeas 45, nays 45. The Speaker gave the casting vote in the affirmative:

CASE OF JOHN P. VAN NESS.

Mr. DAVIS called up the report of the Committee of Elections on the case of John P. Van Ness.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report, as follows:

"That, from the free concessions and agreement of the said member, it appears to your committee that he has accepted and exercised the office of a major of the militia, under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia; and that a paragraph in the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution, which expressly provides, that 'No person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office,' does, in the opinion of your committee, render the acceptance and exercise of the office aforesaid incompatible with the holding, at the same time, of a seat in the House.

"Your committee, therefore, ask leave to submit to the House the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That John P. Van Ness, one of the members of this House, having accepted and exercised the office of major of militia, under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia, has thereby forfeited his right to a seat as a member of this House."

Mr. VAN NESS said he would make a remark or two that would, perhaps, remove any impressions of indelicacy on his part in retaining his seat under the circumstances in which he was placed. He considered himself as standing on that floor, not as a private individual, but as a Representative of New York; and as holding a trust which he was not authorized to abandon before a Constitutional decision should be made. His constituents had placed him there as the guardian of their rights; and that trust he could not desert without a Constitutional decision being made. If that decision should be adverse to his retaining his seat, in retiring from the House he should feel no regret but at leaving his constituents unrepresented during the remainder of the session, at not having discharged all the business assigned him by the Chair, and at ceasing to associate with gentlemen whom, for the most part, he respected. In a pecuniary view, the relinquishing his seat could not in the least affect him; nor should he consider it disreputable to leave a body without any imputation of dishonor or impropriety.

The reasons he should offer to the Committee for retaining his seat, were few and simple. He thought the fair, liberal, and sound construction of the Constitution did not affect his case; that the incapacitating provision only applied to civil offices. The Constitution was only a digest of the most approved principles of the constitutions of the several States, in which the spirit of those constitutions was combined. Not one of those constitutions excluded from office those who had accepted military appointments, except in the regular service. He, therefore, felt a full conviction that it was never the intention of the framers of the Constitution of the United States to exclude militia officers from holding a seat in Congress. And however important it might be to adhere to the letter of the Constitution, yet, when the spirit of it was so clear as it appeared to him, it ought to have weight in the decision of the question before the Committee, which might affect objects of great importance. The right of every portion of the Union to a representation in that House was very important, and ought to be respected in all cases which may either directly or indirectly affect it. Gentlemen, therefore, ought to reflect before they deprive a part of the Union of this important right.

JANUARY, 1803.

Case of John P. Van Ness.

H. OF R.

Mr. V. N. here read the second paragraph of the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution, as follows :

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

From the language of the first part of this paragraph, Mr. V. N. inferred that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the restriction should apply to civil officers only. Gentlemen may ask, shall we, by our construction, countenance an introduction into this House of regular military officers? But to this, it may be replied, that full confidence may be placed on the good sense of the people to prevent this effect. The framers of the Constitution, therefore, thought this a power that might be safely left to the discretion of the people.

The Constitution only applied to two alternative cases. An individual holding a seat in this body could not be appointed to a civil office: and an individual holding a civil office could not hold a seat here. This was all that it was necessary to provide for.

There was another ground. He could not conceive that such an office as he held was comprehended in the Constitution. He was not an officer of the United States, but of a District; which, locally considered, might be looked upon as an island placed in the sea. He could not think that the Constitution meant to exclude officers of dependent colonial districts. It had never been contended that such colonial possessions should be represented on this floor. Why, therefore, apply the exclusion to them?

One great reason for this provision of the Constitution was to prevent corruption. Where could be the danger of this from an office without the least emolument? The inconvenience of exclusion in such cases too would be glaring. Its necessary effect would be an inability to get those to accept commissions in the militia who were proper for the stations.

There was another idea entitled to weight. If it be determined that the militia officers of this District shall be excluded, the same rule will apply to all militia officers, appointed by the Governors of the Territories of the United States. Do you not also exclude the militia officers of the States, who, though appointed in the States, are subject to the command of the United States? A construction of the Constitution, productive of such effects, he considered unsound, and contrary to the intention of its framers.

Had he supposed that the acceptance of an office in the militia would have interfered with his seat in that House, he would never have accepted

it. He had never entertained a doubt on this point until broached in the House. Since then, he had heard various opinions. By what he had heard, his own opinion was not changed, as he believed that a true construction of the Constitution would exclude his case. Should, however, a decision against his holding his seat be made, he should retire without any other regret than that which he had expressed. He had not risen to argue the case as an advocate, but merely to assign the grounds on which he had acted.

Mr. BACON observed, that the Committee of Elections had not thought themselves at liberty to be influenced by the propriety or impropriety of this part of the Constitution, otherwise they might have determined differently; but they felt themselves bound by the Constitution itself. Though the first part of the section of the Constitution referred to civil offices; yet the latter part used the expression any office, which was more comprehensive, and appeared to them to have been intended to have an universal effect.

Mr. THOMAS.—Mr. Chairman: Ever since this question was first agitated, I have felt no small degree of solicitude respecting it. On the one hand, I view the seat of a member of this House, from the State which I have the honor to represent, important; not only as it respects the interest of that State in the deliberations of the National Legislature, but as it respects the feelings of my friend and colleague; and on the other hand, I view the Constitution of my country, which I consider the palladium of our liberties—the rock of our national salvation. But, sir, however important I may consider my colleague's holding his seat on this floor, either as it respects himself or the State of New York, if it comes in competition with that Constitution, it is my duty to, and I shall, readily yield to it. The clause of the Constitution, said Mr. T., which has been quoted by the committee, and which is in point, declares, that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." It appears, said Mr. T., that my colleague did, some time in the recess of Congress, accept and exercise the office of a major in the militia of the District of Columbia, under an act of Congress, and the exclusive Government of the United States; this office, although trivial in itself, without emolument, and to which very little or no influence can attach, nor can it, in my opinion, have a tendency to bias his vote improperly on any question in this House; yet, as I do believe it comes within the province of that clause of the Constitution, and permitting him to retain his seat may establish a precedent which may hereafter be attended with pernicious consequences, I conceive myself bound in justice to myself, as well as to my country, to give my vote to concur with the committee in their report.

The question was then taken on the report of the Committee of Elections, which was agreed to without a division.

The Committee rose, and the House immediately took up their report.

Mr. RANDOLPH observed that, on a precedent so important as was about to be established by the vote of the House, it was unnecessary to say a word. He wished, however, that the disposition of the House to exclude, by an unanimous vote, even the shadow of Executive influence, should be recorded on their journals; for which purpose he called the yeas and nays; which were taken, and were unanimously in favor of the resolution.

TUESDAY, January 18.

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations are necessary in the acts for recording and registering of ships and vessels of the United States, and to report by bill or otherwise.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Henry Messonnier; and no amendment being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of War, stating the trading-houses established in the Indian territories; the progress which has been made in the course of the last year, in settling and marking boundaries with the different tribes; the purchases of lands recently made from them, and the prospect of further progress in marking boundaries, and in new extinguishments of title, in the year to come.

The Message and report were read, and referred to the committee appointed the seventeenth ultimo, on so much of the President's Message as relates to our concerns with Indian tribes, and the establishment of a new settlement.

The House, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered That Mr. ISRAEL SMITH be appointed of the committee to whom was referred, on the third instant, the petition of the Washington Building Company, in the room of Mr. VAN NESS, whose seat in this House has become vacant; and that Mr. PLATER and Mr. BUTLER be added to the said committee.

On motion of Mr. S. SMITH the House adopted a resolution for the appointment of a committee to report whether any and what alterations are necessary in the act for recording and registering American vessels.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Henry Messonnier.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

The House immediately took up the report of the Committee, agreed to it, and ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia.

Sundry amendments were made, and referred to the House, who immediately took them up, and agreed to them with other amendments.

Mr. BAYARD moved an additional amendment, providing that no discharge of an insolvent debtor under this act should have a greater effect in any particular State, to discharge the debtor, than could have been the effect under the insolvent law of such State.

The section was supported by Messrs. BAYARD, HEMPHILL, RANDOLPH, HASTINGS, and BACON; who observed that Congress possessed two descriptions of power: the one applicable to and absolute over the ten miles square; the other universal in its operation, but limited by the federative powers conferred by the Constitution. In exercising the first power, Congress stood precisely, in respect to the District of Columbia, in the relation of a State Legislature to a section of a State. They could not pass any law operating upon the District, in virtue of the first description of power, that could, in its effects, apply to other portions of the United States, without mingling with it power derived from the federative character of the Government. The bill, as it stood without this section, was calculated to give a general discharge to debtors, by freeing them from future arrest in any of the States. The constitutionality of such a provision was denied, and it was questioned whether the State courts would consider themselves bound by it. All that could be rationally asked in this District was, that the situation of the debtor should be the same as though he were the citizen of a State; and this would be the effect of adopting the section. Should the section not be adopted, this District would become the asylum of fraudulent debtors, who would flock hither to obtain a release from their debts, so far as the liberation of their persons throughout the United States could effect it.

Mr. NICHOLSON, on the other hand, opposed the section. He thought that the passage of a law that should be uniform in its operation in all the States, would be preferable to an act partial and of various effect in different States. Should the section be adopted, the debtor, after giving up his all, would only have to go into a State, where his person might be again seized by a vindictive creditor. He did not think this right. There was a peculiar hardship in committing a man to a narrow district of ten miles square, where, instead of changing his situation, improving his circumstances, and comfortably supporting his family, he might be obliged to pine and die at last. Under such circumstances an insolvent law would be almost useless.

The Committee rose, and the House agreed to the amendment.

Mr. ELMENDORF moved a new section, declaring that the provisions of the act should not apply to persons imprisoned at the suit of the United States. Agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Henry Mes-sonnier was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the sufferers by fire, in the town of Portsmouth, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia was read the third time and passed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the annual account of the fund established for defraying the contingent charges of Government. The Message was read, and, together with the documents accompanying it, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RUTLEDGE, from the committee appointed on the seventeenth instant, presented a bill for the importation of ordnance, arms, &c.; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extinguishing the claims of the United States for certain balances reported to be due from several of the States, to the United States, by the commissioners appointed to settle the accounts of the individual States with the United States; and that the said committee have power to report by bill, or otherwise:

The question was taken, that the House do now proceed to take the said motion into consideration, and passed in the negative.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee appointed on the thirtieth ultimo, presented a bill for the encouragement of learning, and for the promotion of useful arts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

NAVY YARDS AND DOCKS.

Mr. MITCHILL moved that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider the report of the select committee, to whom had been referred that part of the President's Message which relates to improvements in navy yards, and the construction of a dry dock at the City of Washington.

The motion, after a short conversation, was agreed to.

The first resolution was read, in the following words:

Resolved, That, for securing from waste and loss the (timber and other public property in the different navy yards, and towards improving the same for the greater despatch of business, the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President of the United States, shall cause the requisite buildings and sheds to be erected, and other needful repairs and improvements to be made; and that, for accomplishing the same, — dollars are hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. M. observed, that there would be no need of much argument to convince the Committee of the propriety of adopting the proposition before them. There were six navy yards belonging to the nation. There was a quantity of timber and materials for naval preparations in each of them. These had been purchased at great expense, and deposited for future use. By virtue of existing contracts, more timber, particularly that for building the six 74's, was expected. When collected and delivered at the several places of destination, it ought to be preserved with the greatest care. This timber was of the most precious kind. Much of it was live oak from the Southern States. The quantity and value of it in the yards at New York, Portsmouth, Norfolk, Charlestown, Philadelphia, and Washington, could be seen in the reports of the Secretary of the Navy. Many of the pieces for keels, sterns, and stern-posts, were very select and difficult to be procured. That invaluable timber was growing scarce. In the progress of cultivation and the arts, a large number of them had been extirpated, and, according to present prospects, a time would, before long, arrive, when such materials as we now possess, and which are bought and paid for, could not be got for money. Some of these naval articles had already been damaged for want of a seasonable appropriation for their better protection from the weather. The shining of the sun and the beating of the storms were both injurious to it, and unless their influence was precluded, they would soon render it unfit for the construction of ships. To preserve this timber from the unavoidable decay which awaited it, he hoped a moderate sum of money might be spared from the Treasury. The erection of some sheds, covers, and buildings, fit to shelter these perishable things, would not require a large amount. This was one of the cases in which the expenditure of a small number of dollars would be productive of great and lasting good. To refuse it, would resemble the mistaken economy of the man who, after having built a magnificent house, could not persuade himself to buy a lock for the street door.

Mr. M. said, he would call the attention of the Committee to another subject connected with the one he had just mentioned. Besides the buildings contemplated, he thought there ought to be an allowance of some money towards repairs and improvements on such of the navy yards, as the officer at the head of that department should find it most convenient to employ. A small sum, to be expended in levelling ground, in docking out, in erecting cranes, and the like, will greatly contribute to the despatch of the public business. He could mention a case to evince the good economy of such an appropriation as he asked for. On the navy yard at New York, one of the finest and most select spots on the coast of the Atlantic, some store-houses had been begun and were unfinished, and consequently useless. The agent, deprived of the means of finishing them, was obliged to pay a considerable sum yearly for storage in the city of New York. He believed that an expenditure there, equal to one or two years' rent, which the nation must unavoidably pay, would finish these magazines and naval depositories, and save the further necessity of paying an extravagant rent. The receiving, overhauling, repairing, and equipping of ships, ordered to that great naval rendezvous, would be promoted, and the public service singularly aided by it. Mr. M. concluded by moving that the blank in the resolution should be filled with the words "fifty thousand dollars."

Carried, without a division.

The second resolution was then read, in the following words:

Resolved, That, for preventing rottenness and decay in the ships of the Navy, the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to cause a dry dock, with convenient canals, locks, machinery, and water courses, to be constructed at or near the public navy yard in the City of Washington; which dock shall be capable of containing twelve frigates, or ships-of-war, and of preserving them dry, and safely sheltered from sunshine and rain; and that, for carrying the same into effect, — dollars be, and the same hereby are, appropriated, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MITCHILL rose, and, after observing that the blank in the resolution required filling up with the words "half a million of dollars," a sum larger perhaps than could be spared at this time from the Treasury, charged with the redemption of the public debt, moved that the Committee rise.

Mr. RUTLEDGE expressed a desire that the Committee, previous to rising, should progress in the consideration of the report, that gentlemen, who were prepared, might offer their sentiments.

Mr. MITCHILL again rose, and informed the Committee that his motion for the Committee to rise, did not proceed from any disinclination to discuss the merits of the proposition now before them. And, to convince the gentleman of his sincerity in this, he withdrew the motion for rising. The history of this project was already very well understood; and the documents printed, and exhibited for the information of Congress, had been, almost ever since the session commenced, before the eyes of the members. The contemplated public work was predicated on a paragraph of the President's Message, at the opening of the session. To elucidate the matters, beautiful and appropriate drawings of the dock and its locks had been laid before the House. Surveys and estimates had been made by the engineers and geometricians, and these had been forwarded for Congressional instruction. Coming before the select committee, who reported the resolution, the recommendation was so highly respectable, and the project so plausible, that there was a unanimous vote in its favor. For his own part, Mr. M. said, he was willing to admit the project a feasible one, and for the present he should not dispute it. The warfare with Tripoli was now upon our hands; and we might have other wars. The preservation of the ships of the Navy was a great public object. The common mode adopted by nations, he believed, was to expend a considerable sum of money, annually, in repairs. Ships could be hove down, or taken into dry docks, and undergo all manner of searching, caulking, coppering, and repairs. In the ordinary mode of taking ships in successively, one dock, capable of containing one ship, would answer for a great number; and each vessel, after being dried, cleaned, and overhauled, could be launched again into her element. The present project was somewhat different. It meditated a dry dock, or receptacle, in which twelve large ships could be laid up at once. He did not know how far experience had warranted such an experiment. But he had been told of something of the same kind done in Sweden; and it had been said that Venice had an establishment of a like nature. But the details of information concerning them were far from being so ample and correct as would render them precedents in the present instance. If the object could be accomplished, the advance of the sum required for the work, would put the navy in such a state of preservation that ships, sheltered within the dry dock, would remain a great length of time uninjured by common accidents. With regard to new ships, not launched nor wetted in service, there could be no doubt they might be so covered and protected as to keep as well as furniture in a house. While dry and shaded, there is no question of their ability to remain sound and unchanged. But it was different with ships that had grown foul and water-soaked in the ocean. It was very questionable whether the dampness acquired could ever be so thoroughly dried out as to prevent putrefaction. The water imbibed would not easily quit the planks and timbers, covered as they were with sheathings, copper, and ballast. Enough moisture would, he feared, remain there to continue the process of corruption and decay in the wooden work. Such a mass of timber, soaked through and through, would perhaps fall to pieces the faster for being kept a long time out of water. The receptacle would probably be damp, and ventilation imperfect. Septic vapors, with moisture, would exert their disorganizing powers. The atmospheric heat being greater than the temperature of river water would accelerate the rotting in Summer. And the expansive power of ice, formed from the imbibed and confined water, might be expected to do no small mischief in Winter. When a ship was under water her temperature was more equal, neither so hot in Summer, nor cold in Winter, as bodies above water; and consequently less exposed to the causes of decay. He should not, however, proceed any further at present on this copious subject; but suspend further remarks until he should hear from the gentlemen who had turned their attention to the project, how this novel and economical proposition presented itself to their understandings, and whether they felt any doubts like those which occupied his own.

H. OF R.

MR. EUSTIS.—Whether the motion for the Committee's rising, be persisted in or withdrawn, we find the result to be the same. Gentlemen will go into the consideration of the merits of the resolution; and, as the whole subject is before us, an interchange of ideas may be useful in forming our judgment and leading to a decision.

Every proposal which has for its object the protection or preservation of the Navy was interesting to the Atlantic States, and peculiarly so to the district he had the honor to represent. To that which was under consideration several objections had occurred to his mind, some of which, instead of being removed, were confirmed by the observations of the Chairman of the Committee, who had inserted the resolution. A fact stated by the engineer was within the knowledge of perhaps every gentleman; that the bed of the river, called the Eastern Branch, (where it is proposed to erect the works,) consists of a loose and shifting earth, which renders it uncertain to what depth it will be necessary to go for a foundation for the stone wall which is to form the front of the first lock; the elevation and breadth or thickness of the wall cannot therefore be ascertained, nor the expense which will be incurred in its structure. But, admitting that a foundation can be had at a reasonable depth, and that there is no danger that this loose soil will be washed into and impede the operations of the first lock; let us imagine the locks and dock completed, according to the plan, and at the estimated expense, the ships hauled into the dry dock, and the water of the Tyber sufficient, at all seasons of the year, to fill the dry dock and to float them back into the river. We then meet the question, whether the great object of the work, the preservation of the ships, will be effected? It is proposed to support them by blocks or props. Is there not danger that ships resting for a long time on comparatively small resting points, will be racked and injured in their frames? And will they be preserved from decay? As part of the dock will probably be sunk beneath the surface of the ground, and as the walls are to be constructed of solid masonry and made water-proof, he was very much inclined to the opinion of the gentleman from New York, that it would be extremely difficult to ventilate it effectually; that there must be a moisture unfavorable to the preservation of wood, iron, and copper. On the other hand should it be found practicable to ventilate perfectly, and to render the air within the arsenal as dry as the external atmosphere, was there not reason to apprehend the same consequences which we have observed in boats and small vessels, which are hauled out of the water, and placed under cover from the sun? By the shrinking of the wood will not the copper fall off, and the expense of new coppering be incurred when they are taken out for use? The success of the experiment was uncertain. It was not known to him that any of the European nations had adopted this plan. They had incurred immense expense in building, and it was to be presumed they had fallen on the best means of preserving their ships. In works of such magnitude he thought it more prudent to follow, than to lead the practice of older and more experienced nations. It was stated, in the report, on the authority of a very respectable naval officer, that an experiment of this kind was making in Sweden, by the recommendation of one of their admirals; but it was worthy of observation that they were making the experiment in deep water, and on the side of a rock; and that the first, if not all their docks, were to be tide docks. The advantages of making locks in places where the tide was eight or ten feet, in preference to those where it rose only four or five, (as in this river,) must be obvious. The present state of our navy required, he apprehended, the construction of tide docks in one or two of the navy yards where the water was deep, and the situation otherwise eligible. One of the frigates requires coppering at this time; others will require repairs; which cannot well be effected without such a provision. He further doubted the expediency of erecting at this time so large an arsenal in this place; he should prefer that the ships should be moored not all in one place, but nearer to the ocean, and to the populous towns, which abounded with seamen and artisans of different kinds.

The engineer had further stated that the dry dock might also be used as a building place; and there could be no doubt it would afford a most commodious one. But he doubted whether it was justifiable to provide an arsenal for building on so extensive a plan at this time and with the present population of this city.

Whether ships were to be built, or repaired, he believed the work would be carried on with greater advantages and despatch in the neighborhood of large seaport towns, which afforded a choice and a competition of workmen.

In the present state of the Navy, and, considering the great extent of our coast, he could not think it advisable to construct an arsenal on so large a scale at any one place, and especially at a distance of nearly three hundred miles from the ocean. He should prefer a distribution of them in some of the navy yards nearer the seaboard, and in the vicinity of populous towns, containing materials and artisans for building and repairing. At some of these places tide docks might be constructed without a very great expense. He had been informed that, at one of the yards, a dock might be made for ten thousand dollars; but he could not be answerable for the correctness of the statement. A provision of this kind was called for. The service actually required it. Ships returning from long voyages needed repairs. One of the ships, which has been repaired at a great expense, ought to be coppered immediately. And it is said it will be cheaper to send her to Europe, than to have it done in this country. The want of suitable docks and wharves is among the reasons. Whether it be owing to some error in the mode of construction, or to whatever other cause, our ships-of-war have decayed in less than half the time than those of other nations. Some of them were, he was apprehensive, in such a state that no cover could preserve them.

These were the observations which had occurred to him on the subject. He would wait for those of other gentlemen, after adding, that it was with reluctance he stated some of the objections, which applied particularly to this place, as the expression of similar ideas had been construed into a disposition unfriendly to it. With every inclination to foster the interests of the city, he was apprehensive this was not a measure calculated to produce that effect. Should the work be completed at the expense of — dollars, and fail, from any of the causes which had been glanced at, to answer the public expectation, or the useful objects on which it is founded, will not the necessary consequence be a discouragement to future enterprises, and to retard instead of promoting its growth and population?

Mr. S. SMITH said, he would not object to the Committee rising, as he was not himself fully prepared to decide on the subject. He would, however, make a few remarks on what had been observed by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. EUSTIS.) It is true that the bottom of the Eastern Branch is generally a deep mud. But the engineer had reported a spot adjoining the navy yard, as the place most proper for the docks; where, fortunately, there was a gravel bottom, sufficiently solid for the construction of the first lock; the second would be on the solid ground, as designated on the drawing. He had no doubt but that the lock could be made. The second would form a good dock for building or repairing ships-of-war. Respecting the arsenal, he confessed himself at a loss to form a correct opinion. He did not, however, believe that there would be any more danger of the ships' hogging, when lowered down, by drawing off the water, on their blocks, than when on the stocks. Experience has shown that ships repaired in dry docks are subjected to a similar risk, and yet few accidents happen in those docks. Whether ships put into such an arsenal could be so completely ventilated as to dry the floor timbers of those that had been any time in the water, was an experiment yet to be made. He knew of no experience from which a judgment could be formed. He had seen, at Venice, above twenty ships-of-war in the arsenal, completely under cover, each laying afloat in its own dock, with stores on each side, in which their materials were deposited. He was told that the whole number could be put to sea in twenty or thirty days' notice. He did not believe that a dock one foot above the tide, on dry, gravelly ground, and of a size to contain twelve ships, when covered over, would be a place so damp that nothing would dry. He believed that if the garboard streaks of each ship were taken off, and streaks taken off their ceiling, at proper intervals, that a current of dry air would be introduced sufficient to keep the ships sweet; experience only could show whether there would be enough to dry the timbers completely; for himself he doubted. As to the quantity of water in the Tiber being insufficient, that objection was done away by the reservoirs contemplated. He had so great a respect for the engineer, that he did not believe he would commence a plan of this importance, unless he was certain of success. He would not commit his character without every probability of succeeding.

Mr. S. said, he knew the spot, and believed that nature had seldom pointed out one more proper than that contemplated. The Eastern Branch was central, the water deep, and being so fresh as to furnish ships for their voyage, could never be effected by the worm; the distance from the sea makes it safe against any immediate or sudden stroke of an enemy; of course peculiarly proper for building ships-of-war. The Potomac and other waters of the Chesapeake, offer great supplies of the best of oak, walnut, locust, and mulberry. The masts got in the neighborhood of Norfolk, are inferior to none. Susquehanna offers an inexhaustible store of pine for masts and spars. There, and there only, could be procured the masts for Algiers. North Carolina is in its vicinity to supply naval stores, and on the Potomac mines of the best iron ore are known, and worked. He believed it a fact admitted, that the oak of the Chesapeake, and particularly of East and North rivers of Virginia, lasted, in ships, nearly double the time that the oak of the Eastern ships did. He believed that the industry of our Eastern brethren had nearly exhausted their best timber; for, if he had been rightly informed, the keel of the Constitution, built in Boston, was brought from Jersey. The gentleman will admit all this, but he asks where are the men? They are to be had on an exigency nowhere but in large towns. Wherever, said Mr. S., there is plenty of work, and plenty of money to pay, there men will go: they will be brought from the Eastern States, and from the rivers of the Chesapeake; commence building, give employment, and men will not be wanting. The question is, whether it is the cheaper to bring the men to the spot where all the materials are, or to carry the materials to the men? But the water of the Potomac is not sufficiently deep for ships-of-war. It was deeper, he believed, than the Delaware, and as deep as the entrance to New York; he was informed that the ship Constellation touched going out of that port. It was true that it was deemed prudent to lighten the large frigates when they came up the Potomac, but it is believed that those of twenty-two feet draught would have been in no danger, had they come up without. It is true that the navigation of the river is sometimes tedious, but never dangerous; that of the Chesapeake is inferior to no inland navigation that he knew. The intention of erecting dry docks was not confined to this place alone; he had understood that, at the navy yard near Boston, a convenient spot offered itself, and that docks built there might be filled from the Middlesex canal. It was contemplated to make the experiment under the eye of Government, and, if successful here, to extend it to Boston. For his part, Mr. S. said, that he would willingly give his consent to building docks at Boston when brought forward at a proper time.

Mr. S. agreed that more convenience for building and repairing of ships, offered in large and populous cities, yet some of our best ships, for merchant service, are built in small towns; he alluded to the ship-builders in East and North rivers in Virginia, and excellent builders on the Eastern shore of the Chesapeake. Expedition will always be good under the eye of a master, even when the means appear fewer. Some experience has been had by Government. Had any of the ships, he asked, ordered for the Mediterranean from Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or Norfolk, been put to sea in the time that the ships New York and John Adams were despatched from this city? He believed the former was ready in fifteen days, the latter in twenty-one days: and he might say that, not one of those from large ports, were despatched in less than six or eight weeks. The truth was, that men could be brought from the large towns in the Union to man them, while the ships were rigging.

Mr. S. said he had made these few hasty observations, in answer to the gentleman (Mr. EUSTIS,) but he believed it would be improper to press gentlemen at this session into a decision on a subject of so much importance; he believed, also, that it would be prudent at this time to make no appropriation of money that could be avoided. A peaceful object, such as the arsenal, for the preservation of our ships, might be postponed until another session, when more information may probably be had, and when we shall better know whether we can spare the money from objects that may be more important.

The question was then taken on the rising of the Committee, and carried.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again; which was granted.

THURSDAY, January 20.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the law, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States," and to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. BRENT, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. JONES, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported, yesterday, from the Committee of the Whole to the bill for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington; and the said amendments being, severally, twice read at the Clerk's table, were, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. BRENT, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-first ultimo, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That, whensoever the Legislature of Virginia shall pass a law authorizing the incorporated society of that State, known by the name of the "Mutual Insurance Society, on buildings in Virginia, against accidents by fire," to extend their insurances on buildings in the county of Alexandria, agreeably to the same laws, rules, and regulations, by which the said society is governed in their insurances in that State, from thenceforth, it shall be lawful for the said society to have the same right and mode of recovering in the courts of the county of Alexandria against any inhabitant thereof, so insuring with the said society his building in the said county against accidents by fire, which might be had against him, if the person so insuring was a citizen, and the buildings so insured situated in the State of Virginia.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. BRENT, Mr. VAN HORNE, and Mr. TALLMADGE, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Hugh Alexander, and others; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were recommitted, on the thirteenth instant, the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three," made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth concur with the Committee of Ways and Means in so much of their report as relates to an agreement to the amendments of the Senate, with an amendment to the second amendment.

Ordered, That the residue of the said report be referred to a Committee of the whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole thereon; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorize the Adjutant and Inspector, and Paymaster of the Army, to frank, and to receive, free of postage, all letters and packages on public service, to and from their respective offices.

Ordered, That the resolution be referred to the committee appointed on the fourteenth ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States."

NAVY YARDS AND DOCKS.

On motion of Mr. S. SMITH, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee appointed on that part of the President's Message relating to navy yards and docks.

Mr. S. SMITH moved that the Committee should rise and report their agreement to the first resolution.

* Mr. GRISWOLD had no objection to the Committee rising, in order to report on the first resolution.

Military Establishment.

JANUARY, 1803.

As for the second, contemplating the erection of a dry dock upon the plan presented by the President, he believed there were other gentlemen beside himself who wished for further information before the subject was dismissed. He must confess, he said, that the project appeared to him as a visionary scheme, originating in the philosophy of the present day; yet he was of opinion they should not entirely lose sight of the object; that something should be done for preserving, and repairing the ships of which our present navy was composed; that a dock, constructed upon the plan suggested yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVRIST,) which might cost from ten to twenty thousand dollars, would produce all the advantages, which had been calculated would result from the expensive establishment of half a million. He considered it more necessary to make provision for building and repairing vessels of war, than to erect a dock, in which to lay up twelve frigates. He hoped, if the committee did rise, that they would report their agreement to the first resolution, and ask leave to sit again on the second.

Mr. BACON thought the subjects of the resolution were distinct and separate. The first related to the repairing of ships of war, and the latter to taking care of ships after they were built. To take them up together, would create confusion. He said, they should consider whether it was proper to plunge themselves into an expense of a million of dollars upon experiments and chimerical projects. It might be the decided opinion of the President that it was best to erect a dry dock at the City of Washington; but the President's opinion was not to govern him. They should also recollect that they had diminished taxes, and although the revenue had been productive, it might not continue so. In his opinion it was best to wait the events of another year, to see whether our differences with foreign nations were likely to be settled, and whether we should not have use for our money, before they expended a million of dollars upon a project, they know not what.

The Committee rose and reported the first resolution, which was agreed to by the House. Leave was not obtained to sit again. After a lengthy conversation, the following resolution was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the usefulness and propriety of constructing a dock or docks, at either of the public navy yards, or elsewhere, within the United States, for the building and repair of ships of war.

MESSRS. MITCHILL, RUTLEDGE, HANNA, WADSWORTH, and MOTT, were appointed the committee.

FRIDAY, January 21.

An engrossed bill for incorporating an insurance company in the City of Washington was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the consideration of the said amendments be postponed until Monday next.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Hugh Alexander and others was read the third time and passed.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the Mint establishment at Philadelphia; and whether any, and what, alterations or improvements may be made in the said institution.

Ordered, That Mr. DENNIS, Mr. DAVENPORT, Mr. DAWSON, Mr. ALSTON, and Mr. BACON, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee appointed on the 7th instant, to consider whether any, and what, alterations are necessary in the Military Establishment of the United States, as follows:

Resolved, That there be added to the regiment of artillery two teachers of music, whose pay, rations, and clothing shall be the same as is by law allowed to the teachers of music of the regiment of infantry.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint one teacher of the French language and one teacher of drawing, to be attached to the corps of engineers, whose compensation shall not exceed the pay and emoluments of a captain.

Resolved, That the commanding officer of the corps of engineers be authorized to enlist, for a term not less than three years, one artificer and eighteen men, to aid in making practical experiments, and for other purposes, to receive the same pay, rations, and clothing, as are allowed to the artificers and privates in the Army of the United States, and the same bounty, when enlisted for five years, and to be subject to the rules and articles of war.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to allow to the Paymaster of the Army, the Adjutant and Inspector of the Army, and the Military Agent at Philadelphia, such sums each for clerk hire as their respective duties may, in his opinion, reasonably require.

The first resolution was agreed to—yeas 36, nays 21.

The second resolution was agreed to—yeas 42, nays 17.

The third resolution was agreed to without a division.

The fourth resolution was opposed by Mr. GREGG, on the ground that the discretion thereby vested in the President of the United States was improper; and that if an application for the clerk hire of the officers therein named was necessary, it ought to be made and defined by law.

On the question being put, the resolution was disagreed to—yeas 25.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions agreed to.

The House immediately took up the report, when Mr. RANDOLPH remarked that, notwithstanding the importance of the business before the House, there was scarcely a quorum within the bar, in consequence, probably, of the intense cold. As he was averse to interesting business being thus conducted, he moved that the House adjourn. Carried—yeas 42, nays 35.

MONDAY, January 24.

A new member, to wit: RICHARD WINN, returned to serve in this House as a member from South Carolina, in the room of Thomas Sumter, appointed a Senator of the United States, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made by Congress in the existing regulations for granting clearances, certificates, and other documents, to American vessels sailing from the Mississippi, with the produce of the United States, in order to identify the growth and insure the admission of any such produce and vessels into foreign ports, on the same terms as those sailing from the Atlantic ports of the United States with the produce thereof; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That, inasmuch as the late Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio have, by virtue of an act of Congress passed on the first day of May, one thousand eight hundred and two, formed a Constitution and State Government, and have thereby, and by virtue of an act of Congress aforesaid, become a separate and independent State, by the name of "Ohio," that PAUL FEARING, a member of this House, who was elected by the late Territorial Government of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, is no longer entitled to a seat in this House:

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of Elections; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York was presented to the House and read, praying that such acts or parts of acts heretofore passed by Congress as make a discrimination between American and foreign duties on imports and tonnage, may not be repealed, for the reasons therein specified.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the 10th instant, a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the 15th ultimo, as relates to discriminating and countervailing duties, and the act of the British Parliament on that subject.

Mr. VAN RENSSLAER, from the committee to whom was committed, on the 10th instant, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to carry into effect several resolutions of Congress for erecting monuments to the memories of the Generals Wooster, Harkemer, Davidson, and Scriven," reported several amendments thereto; which were read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to lay before this House a statement of the direct tax, together with the reasons, if known, why the collection thereof hath not been completed.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed, on the 22d ultimo, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations or amendments are necessary to be made to the act, entitled "An act to amend an act, entitled 'An act to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States,'" made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill supplementary to the "Act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls," and for the further protection of American seamen; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a statement of the quantities of fish, foreign or domestic, annually imported into, or exported from the United States, since the present Government first went into operation, and the duties and bounties annually paid thereon; and that he be further directed to lay before the House a statement of the quantity of tonnage annually and respectively employed in the cod and whale fisheries, and the number of seamen employed therein, together with the amount of duty annually and respectively paid on the tonnage of the ships or vessels employed in the said fisheries.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported from the Committee of the whole House on Friday last, to the report of the committee appointed to consider whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary in the Military Establishment of the United States; and the said amendment being twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

The said report being then amended at the Clerk's table, the House, thereupon, came to the following resolutions, to wit:

Resolved, That there be added to the regiment of artificers, two teachers of music, whose pay, rations, and clothing, shall be the same as is by law allowed to the teachers of music in the regiment of infantry.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to appoint one teacher of the French language, and one teacher of drawing, to be attached to the corps of engineers, whose compensation shall not exceed the pay and emoluments of a captain.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to allow the Paymaster of the Army, the Adjutant and Inspector of the Army, and the Military Agent at Philadelphia, such sums, not exceeding in the whole two thousand dollars, for clerk hire, as their respective duties may, in his opinion, reasonably require.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. VARNUM, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. BUTLER, Mr. LEWIS R. MORRIS, and Mr. CLAY, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported on the twenty-first instant, from the Committee of the whole House, to the bill additional to, and amendatory of an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia;" and the said amendments, being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The said bill was further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be recommitted to Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. PLATER, and Mr. CAMPBELL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the 20th instant, on the petition of William Ray and John Follawell, presented the tenth of January, one thousand eight hundred and one; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of William Ray, and John Follawell, is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

Ordered, That a bill, or bills, be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. DAVIS said he held a resolution in his hand, which embraced a measure of considerable importance, and which he had long contemplated. He had suggested it last session; but, owing to the press of other business, he had not then urged it. He then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of concentrating the several public offices, and other public buildings, belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington."

Mr. D. gave notice that, in case the resolution should be agreed to, he should move the appointment of a committee by ballot, instead of the ordinary way, by the Speaker.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Mr. S. SMITH, according to notice, called for the order of the day on the report on discriminating duties.

Mr. EUSTIS hoped the gentleman would suspend the call for it, at least this and the ensuing week. He observed, that the commercial towns were now attending to the subject. It appeared to him highly important that the opinions of the merchants of the United States should be known. When known, the House would be enabled to act, if not with better understanding, at least with greater satisfaction. For himself, he was not only not prepared to vote, but even to give an opinion. He thought the opinions of the merchants who, from their great interest, had probably formed the most correct views, ought to be known, before they formed theirs.

Mr. S. SMITH said, this was not a new subject. It had been proposed early in the last session. It had not then been called up, because it had received an unexpected opposition. The mover had thought proper to postpone it, until gentlemen should have an opportunity of going home and consulting their constituents. Early in this session, the President had attracted the attention of the House to it in his Message. The House referred the subject to a select committee, who had reported. To that report two memorials had been opposed, which would have their due weight. In consequence of the proposition made last session, the British Parliament had passed an act whose operation would expire either on the 5th or 25th of March. If this subject were postponed until a member from Georgia had time to get information from his constituents, what time would remain to pass the measure, or if passed, to get it to England in sufficient time? He had really hoped that gentlemen would at this late period have been prepared for the discussion. It was not probable the question would be decided in a day; the discussion, if now commenced, would probably continue until gentlemen obtained information from their constituents. It was unpleasant in the chairman of the committee who had reported on the subject to press its discussion, but he thought it best to enter upon it now: particularly as he had always found deliberations within those walls more calculated to inform his mind, than out-of-door or newspaper information. Perhaps, too, on going into a Committee, some amendment might be offered that would give the subject a new aspect, and prepare gentlemen, at present hostile, to come into it.

Mr. SOUTHARD thought one consideration might induce the gentleman from Maryland to postpone the subject for a few days. The memorial from New York, just read, contained facts, and reasoning from those facts the House had determined to print it. He therefore thought it best to postpone it, at any rate, until that was printed.

Mr. MITCHELL had no objection to going into a Committee of the Whole in order to discuss the merits of the subject. He observed that it was not only important to have the opinions of the merchants on the proposition, but also of a large body of mechanics whose interests were materially involved. He expected a memorial from his constituents of that description, probably this very night. However opposed their convictions were to the proposed measure, they were honest convictions, and arose from a belief that it would be prejudicial to their interests. For himself, he was ready for discussion; but he believed nothing would be lost by a short delay.

Mr. LOWNDES said, he was very much in the situation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) unprepared on the subject. He was, however, ready to go into a Committee of the Whole. The Chairman of that Committee could, doubtless, furnish a great deal of valuable information; and he thought they would be sooner prepared for decision in that way than in any other. He was, therefore, in favor of going into Committee for the purpose of discussion, though not of decision.

Mr. BAYARD differed from his friend from South Carolina. The resolutions urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts have great force. It was said, however, that we may now enter upon the discussion, and may hereafter receive light from the memorials that shall be presented, and derive then the same benefit from the information they may furnish as if they were before us now. But we all know that, as soon as we engage in the discussion of any subject, we immediately form opinions respecting it; and we also know the pride of previous opinion, and the difficulty of retracting steps once taken. These were strong considerations. Our minds ought to be a carte blanche when we go into the discussion, and we ought to be possessed of every information before it is commenced.

But it is said, the act of the British Parliament will expire on the 25th of March, at the furthest. If this were a fact, it was even now too late to enter on the discussion in order to meet the provisions of that act. But if the British Government were sincere, they will delegate a continuance of power. If this measure shall be agreed to here, it could not be carried into full effect without negotiation and some delay. What is done abroad will have to return here and be ratified, before it shall be binding. There is, therefore, not time for this before the 25th of March. But there was no reason to apprehend that the British Parliament would withhold the passage of a similar act to that lately passed.

He was strongly in favor of a postponement, as the House did not possess the information which it ought to have, nor were they acquainted with the disposition of their constituents. For, though the measure had been mentioned at the last session, and though the present resolution had been on the table for some time, yet it was evident that, before the present time, the public mind had not been excited to the subject.

Mr. JONES hoped, as no material inconvenience could arise from a short delay, the gentleman from Maryland would agree to waive his call. His present impression was in favor of the measure; but he felt, notwithstanding, desirous of obtaining information from his constituents. That night's mail might furnish the information he wished. He, therefore, moved a postponement of the subject until Monday next.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he wished at that time to go into Committee, if it were only to receive an amendment, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. JONES) had shown him, in order that the amendment, as well as the original resolution, should go to the people. He thought the amendment would be salutary. The memorials received had assumed as a fact what was not correct, and argued from it as though it were correct. They had assumed it as a fact, that it was contemplated to give permission to foreign vessels to bring into the United States goods not of the growth or manufacture of their country free from any discriminating duty. Whereas, the resolution proposed by the Committee was directly the reverse. For instance; a British ship will not be permitted to bring into the United States the wines or brandies of France, without paying a discriminating duty. The very contrary impression appears to have existed on the minds of the Chambers of Commerce of Philadelphia and New York; and they argued at large upon it.

This was not a new subject; it was contemplated in the Message of the President. Immediately after the receipt of the Message, the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia had sent a circular letter to the merchants of the United States. One of those letters was received by the merchants of Baltimore. They thought they understood the subject; and they had no impression that the measure would be prejudicial to their interest. He believed a similar circular had been sent to other merchants in the United States. Some of the merchants thought it would be injurious; but he believed they were mistaken. On the contrary, he believed that a great good, instead of an injury, would result from it. His only wish, then, was, that they might go into a Committee, and there receive the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the whole subject might go forth in its true colors.

Mr. BACON thought the question of postponement lay in a very narrow compass. The House had received a petition; and had sustained it by ordering it to be printed for the use of the members. Will they, then, anticipate the subject, and before they have derived that benefit which they have recognised from the publication of the memorial, prematurely enter on a discussion? Such proceedings would evidence an inconsistency with themselves.

The question was then taken on a postponement until Monday next, and carried by a large majority.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. MITCHILL rose to address the House on a subject of a commercial nature. He alluded to the depredations committed upon the commerce of the United States, by French armed vessels, during the late war in Europe. The gentlemen of the House would, he hoped, turn their attention, for a few minutes, to the numerous memorials received from our merchants during the last session, praying compensation for those losses. These papers were numerous and respectful, and came from a most valuable portion of our fellow-citizens. Their grievances had not hitherto been redressed, nor even inquired into with the minuteness which, it appeared to him, to deserve. It was true a committee, numerous and intelligent, had been appointed during the last session, to examine the matter of these applications. A report had been made to the House. This report was full of information concerning the political and commercial connexion between the United States and France. It comprised a concise and correct history of what had been done on both sides, since the mutual misunderstandings arose. It was a valuable document, as far as it went; but it did not conclude with any recommendation of a mode of relief, or even of investigation. It stopped short with the historical narrative, without proposing even a mode of further inquiry. During the present session, nothing further had been done or attempted. Early after the Congress assembled, he had himself given notice of an intention to revive the subject. It was confessedly of magnitude enough to merit investigation. This notice, he remembered, was given previous to the receipt of the message from the Executive. But the multitude of public business that had grown out of that communication, added to other subjects, had so completely occupied his mind, that he had hitherto suffered it to pass on without bestowing on it the consideration which he owned that it deserved. He was now ready to make amends for this inadvertent or necessary, certainly not intentional, delay. He had heard, with satisfaction, the call of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. LOWNDES) for his (Mr. MITCHILL's) promised motion. He acknowledged the hint of that gentleman to be seasonable, and felt himself obliged to him for acting the part of a good prompter. To show that gentleman that he had profited by the suggestion made on Friday last, he had now risen with an intention to lay a resolve upon the table. The object of the resolve was to cause an inquiry to be entered upon, by a special committee of the House, as to what amount of property, or its value in current money, had been taken from the Americans during the late war by the cruisers of France. The committee could devise some mode of ascertaining the magnitude of the sufferings complained of. This he considered as the first step that ought to be taken, towards the procuring of redress for the petitioners. And, until this was taken, he believed nothing was likely to be done. Another object of the resolve he was about to offer, was to instruct the same committee to inquire into the different classes of captures and claims. He did not suppose that all the petitioners were entitled to compensation. Some of them, he knew, were not; but it was equally clear that some of them were. This complicated mass of applications could be examined by a committee, who could draw some distinctions that would be useful. They could tell, for instance, that one sort were lawful captures for and on account of contraband, others for want of a role d'équipage, others were taken wrongfully, without any cause whatever, and the like. Some judgment might be formed in this way of the probable amount that might be contemplated as bona fide claims. He suspected this amount would be but an inconsiderable part of the gross amount of captures. But whether it was large or small, he hoped an examination would be attempted; and, for that purpose, he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire by what means the value or amount of property taken from citizens of the United States by the French, during the late war in Europe, can be best ascertained, and the several sorts of captures distinguished and classed, and report their opinion thereon to this House, to the end that indemnification may be made.

Mr. MITCHILL then said, that he did not press an instant decision upon it; but wished it to lie a day or two on the table for consideration.

TUESDAY, January 25.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report by the Superintendent of the City of Washington, on the affairs of the city committed to his care.

The Message was read, and, together with the documents accompanying the same, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DAVENPORT, from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business, who were instructed, by a resolution of the tenth instant, "to inquire and report to this House the probable amount for which the houses and lots at present occupied by the Mint, in the city of Philadelphia, together with the personal property of that establishment, could be sold; and also the probable expense of procuring more suitable ground; erecting the necessary buildings; and constructing the machinery for the establishment, on the principle of having it worked by steam," made a report thereon; which was read, and, together with the documents accompanying the same, ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on the twenty-first instant, "to inquire into the expediency of continuing the Mint Establishment at Philadelphia, and whether any, and what, alterations or improvements may be made in the said institution."

Ordered, That Mr. DENNIS be excused from serving on the committee last mentioned, and that Mr. MITCHILL be appointed of the said committee in his stead.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the fifteenth ultimo, "as refers to the warfare with Tripoli, and to the relation with the other Barbary Powers," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making an appropriation for the preservation of timber in the public navy yards, and for the improvement of the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Postmaster General, accompanying two statements, marked A and B, exhibiting a list of post roads which have not produced one-third of the expense of carrying the mail on the same, after having been established two years; also, the number of post offices, the length of post roads, the weekly and yearly transportation of the mails, and the mode of transporting the same, at the several periods therein set forth; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on the fourteenth ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made to the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States."

Mr. HELMS, from the committee appointed on the twelfth instant, presented a bill to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS called up his motion laid on the table yesterday, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of concentrating the several public offices, and other public buildings, belonging to the United States in the City of Washington.

Which was agreed to without debate—ayes fifty-five; when a motion was made to appoint the committee, consisting of seven members, by ballot, and carried—ayes fifty-three.

The ballots being taken, the SPEAKER appointed Messrs. T. MORRIS and WOODS, tellers.

On declaring the ballots, it appeared that but one member of the committee was elected, viz: Mr. DAVIS; he only having a majority of all the votes given.

The House then proceeded to a second ballot. [According to a standing rule of the House, only a plurality of votes is required on a second ballot.]

The ballots being declared, the following additional members of the committee appeared to be appointed, viz:

MESSRS. GRISWOLD, MITCHILL, GREGG, CONDIT, BAYARD, and R. WILLIAMS.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a copy of the proceedings of a number of the citizens of Washington county, in the Mississippi Territory of the United States, containing an address to this House, stating certain grievances to which the citizens of the said county have been, and are now subjected; which was read, in the words following, to wit:

1st. That the landed claims within the limits of Washington district are in a more precarious situation than those on the Mississippi.

2dly. That a petition from the citizens of this county, whilst under the jurisdiction of the Spanish Government, was forwarded to the Commandant at Mobile, and by him transmitted to the Governor of New Orleans, praying that a Surveyor might be allowed them, to run out their lands; but none ever came forward, by reason of which, their lands remain unsurveyed; notwithstanding which, these citizens request that their claims may be placed on an equal footing with those on the Mississippi.

3dly. That the citizens of this county be allowed to hold their possessions by occupancy.

4thly. That a great extension of boundary might easily be obtained from the neighboring Indians, by sending forward Commissioners for that purpose, which would add much to our interest and convenience.

5thly. That we are in possession of a treaty, entered into between the Alabama Indians and the Spanish Government, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, conveying to that Government the lands lying between the confluence of the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers; by virtue, and under which treaty, a part of the lands thus conveyed was granted to the citizens of this county, and in their present occupancy.

6thly. That the district of Washington lies under great inconveniences, for want of a post office established, and labors under many and grievous disadvantages for want of a free port at Mobile.

7thly, and lastly. That there are two federal garrisons almost in the heart of the settlements; and, from the austere and abrupt behaviour of the officers commanding, towards the citizens, they are kept in a perpetual confusion: it is hoped this grievance will be remedied by their removal on the boundary line.

Ordered, That the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth clauses of the said address, be referred to the Commissioners appointed under the act, entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory," with instruction to examine the same, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That the sixth clause of the said address be referred to the committee appointed on the fourteenth ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States."

Ordered, That the seventh and last clause of the said address be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

WEDNESDAY, January 26.

Ordered, That the committee appointed, on the fourteenth ultimo, "to inquire whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made in the acts establishing a post office and post roads within the United States," be discharged from the consideration of so much of the sixth clause of an address to this House, from the citizens of Washington county, in the Mississippi Territory, referred to them on the twenty-fifth instant, as relates to the inconvenience complained of by the said citizens, for "the want of a port at Mobile;" and that the same be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the seventeenth ultimo, the memorial of William R. Miller and William H. Boardman, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, made a report thereon; which was read, and considered; Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be directed to report a bill making it necessary for unregistered ships of the United States to take the Mediterranean passports, in the same manner that registered ships of the United States are now compelled to take them.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee of Elections, to whom it was referred to examine the certificates or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, made a farther report thereon, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of William Ray and John Follawell; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed, presented a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the repeal of the discriminating duties on foreign tonnage and merchandise imported in foreign vessels, recommended by the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, in their report on that subject, made on the tenth instant, shall not extend to foreign ships or vessels, or the articles imported therein from the colonies or dependencies of any foreign nation, unless the ships and vessels of the United States shall enjoy the same privileges in the navigation and trade between the United States and such colonies or dependencies, as are, or may be, allowed to the ships and vessels of the nation to which such colonies or dependencies may belong."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the tenth instant, a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the fifteenth ultimo, "as relates to discriminating and countervailing duties, and the act of the British Parliament on that subject."

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of the proprietors of the Salem turnpike road, in Massachusetts; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee, of the twenty-fifth instant, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the fifteenth ultimo, "as refers to the warfare with Tripoli, and to the relation with the other Barbary Powers;" and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for building or purchasing four vessels of war, to carry not exceeding sixteen guns each.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. EUSTIS, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. ELMENDORF, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. HILL, from the committee to whom was referred, on the seventeenth instant, the memorial of sundry inhabitants of the town of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina, made a report thereon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That the system of policy stated in the said memorial to exist, and to be now pursued in the French colonial governments of the West Indies, is fraught with danger to the peace and safety of the United States. That the fact stated to have occurred in the prosecution of that system of policy, demands the prompt interference of the Government of the United States, as well Legislative as Executive.

"The committee, therefore, recommend that the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of State, to be laid before the President; and, in pursuance of the authority granted to them, herewith report a bill, which is submitted."

Mr. HILL, from the committee, presented a bill to prevent the importation of certain persons, whose admission is prohibited by certain laws of the State governments; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House, on Monday next.

Ordered, That the petition of sundry citizens of Georgetown and its vicinity, in the District of Columbia, presented the fifth of April last, be referred to Mr. GREGG, Mr. EARLY, and Mr. FOSTER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same with their opinion thereupon.

Ordered, That the memorial of Charles Pettit, surviving partner of Major General Greene and John Cox, in the late office of Quartermaster General of the United States, presented the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, and sundry documents accompanying the same, marked A, B, and C, together with the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Committee of Claims thereon, of the twenty-seventh of March and twenty-ninth of April, one thousand eight hundred, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the encouragement of learning and the promotion of the useful arts.

Mr. BAYARD moved to amend the section so as to extend the privilege of obtaining patents to aliens as well as citizens.

Messrs. BAYARD, S. SMITH, and EARLY, supported, and Messrs. RANDOLPH, GRISWOLD, and MITCHELL, opposed the motion.

On the question being put, the motion was lost—ayes 19, noes 44.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for laying out a new road in the county of Washington.

Mr. VARNUM moved to strike out the first section. He thought that, if any, a general provision should be made.

Mr. GRISWOLD objected to other parts of the bill, coinciding with Mr. VARNUM as to the first section.

Mr. DENNIS moved that the Committee should rise, in which case he would move for a recommitment of the bill to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill making general provisions on the subject of roads within the Territory of Columbia.

Importation of Arms.

H. OF R.

This motion was carried without a division; the Committee rose, and were refused leave to sit again; when Mr. DENNIS's motion was agreed to.

On motion, it was Resolved That the committee appointed on the twenty-ninth ultimo, "to inquire into the propriety of granting further time to proprietors or holders of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same," be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the proprietors or holders of military land warrants to locate their respective claims on a less quantity than four thousand acres; and report their opinion thereon to the House.

IMPORTATION OF ARMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the importation of ordnance, arms, &c.

Mr. RUTLEDGE proposed an amendment for extending the right of importation, duty free, to individuals as well as States.

Messrs. BACON and S. SMITH said a few words against, and Messrs. MACON and RUTLEDGE in favor of the amendment; when, on the question being taken, it was lost—ayes 36, noes 45.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill without amendment.

On taking the question on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, the yeas and nays were required, and were—yeas 46, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, Walter Bowie, William Butler, John Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Manasseh Cutler, John Davenport, Thomas T. Davis, John Dennis, Wm. Dickson, Peter Early, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, Benjamin Huger, Samuel Hunt, Thomas Lowndes, David Meriwether, Thomas Moore, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, Joseph H. Nicholson, Thomas Plater, Nathan Read, John Rutledge, John Cotton Smith, Richard Stanford, John Stanley, Samuel Tenney, David Thomas, Thomas Tillinghast, Abram Trigg, George B. Upham, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Lemuel Williams, Richard Winn, Henry Woods, and Thomas Wynns.

And so the said bill was rejected.

THURSDAY, January 27.

Mr. BRENT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what, alterations are necessary in the several acts relative to the establishment of a Marine Corps, and in an act fixing the rank and pay of the commanding officer of the corps of Marines; and that the committee be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. GRISWOLD, and Mr. GREGG, be appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

A memorial of sundry mechanics of the City and State of New York was presented to the House and read, praying that such acts or parts of acts heretofore passed by Congress, as relate to discriminating duties of imports and tonnage between the ships or vessels of the United States and those belonging to Great Britain, and other foreign nations, may not be repealed, for the reasons therein specified. Referred.

Ordered, That Mr. BACON be appointed of the committee to whom was referred, on the tenth instant, a memorial of Samuel Blodget, relative to the establishment "of a National University within and for the United States," and to the erecting of an appropriate and characteristic equestrian statue of the late General GEORGE WASHINGTON," in the room of Mr. VAN NESS, whose seat in this House hath become vacant.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented to the House an abstract of the exportation to the European ports of Great Britain and France, in the years one thousand eight hundred, and one thousand eight hundred and one, of sundry articles, therein enumerated; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the tenth instant, a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the fifteenth ultimo, "as relates to discriminating and counter-vailing duties, and the act of the British Parliament on that subject."

Mr. BACON laid the following motions on the table:

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to cede to the State of Virginia the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Virginia, by an act passed the third day of December, in the year 1789, entitled "An act for the cession of ten miles square," or any lesser quantity of "territory within this State, to the United States, in Congress assembled," for the permanent seat of the General Government: Provided, That the said State of Virginia shall consent and agree thereto.

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to cede to the State of Maryland the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Maryland, by an act passed the nineteenth day of December, in the year 1791, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Columbia and the City of Washington:" Provided,

UNITED STATES JUDGES.

The several petitions of William Tilghman, Oliver Wolcott, Richard Bassett, Charles Magill, Samuel Hitchcock, Benjamin Bourne, Egbert Benson, Philip B. Key, William Griffith, Jeremiah Smith, and George K. Taylor, were presented to the House and read, respectively representing, that, by an act of Congress, passed on the thirteenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and one, entitled "An act for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," certain judicial offices were created, and courts established, called Circuit Courts of the United States: That, in virtue of appointments made under the Constitution of the United States, the petitioners became vested with the offices so created, and received commissions, authorizing them to hold the same, with the emoluments thereunto appertaining, during their good behaviour: That, during the last session, an act of Congress passed, by which the abovementioned law was declared to be repealed; since which no law has been made for assigning to the petitioners the execution of any judicial function, nor has any provision been made for the payment of their stipulated compensations: That, under these circumstances, and finding it expressly declared in the Constitution of the United States that "the Judges both of the Supreme and Inferior Courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office," the petitioners are compelled to represent it as their opinion, that the rights secured to them by the Constitution, as members of the Judicial department, have been impaired: That, "with this sincere conviction, and influenced by a sense of public duty, they most respectfully request of Congress to review the existing laws, which respect the offices in question, and to define the duties to be performed by the petitioners, by such provisions as shall be consistent with the Constitution, and the convenient administration of justice:" That "the right of the petitioners to their compensations, they sincerely believe to be secured by the Constitution, notwithstanding any modification of the Judicial department, which, in the opinion of Congress, public convenience may recommend. This right, however, involving a personal interest, will cheerfully be submitted to Judicial examination and decision, in such manner as the wisdom and impartiality of Congress may prescribe: That judges should not be deprived of their offices or compensations, without misbehaviour, appears, to the petitioners, to be among the first and best established principles of the American constitutions; and, in the various reforms they have undergone, it has been preserved and guarded with increased solicitude: That, on this basis, the Constitution of the United States has laid the foundation of the Judicial department, and expressed its meaning in terms equally plain and peremptory:" That, "this being the deliberate and solemn opinion of the petitioners, the duty of their stations requires that they should express it to the Legislative body. They regret the necessity which compels them to make the representation; and they confide, that it will be attributed to a conviction that they ought not, voluntarily, to surrender rights and authorities entrusted to their protection, not for their personal advantage, but for the benefit of the community."

Mr. GRISWOLD moved a reference of the foregoing memorial to a select committee.

Mr. GREGG observed that, according to the usual mode of transacting business, it ought to go to the Committee of Claims. He, therefore, made that motion.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he entertained a high respect for the Committee of Claims, and was always in favor of referring to them petitions that merely involved demands for money. But he thought this memorial stood upon very different ground. It proposes a revision of the laws, in order to assign the judges duties proper to be trusted to them; and it also proposes the submission of the question of compensation to judicial decision. These points are of a very distinct nature from those referred to the Committee of Claims; for which reasons he thought such reference improper.

Mr. RANDOLPH did not think a select committee, or the Committee of Claims, a proper committee to whom to refer this memorial. What is its nature? Does it embrace any point of fact on which a committee is to make inquiry? No. It is a broad Constitutional question. He was, therefore, in favor of having it examined, where it must eventually be settled, in the House. If, therefore, the memorial had any reference, it ought to be referred to a Committee of the whole House; to which effect he made a motion.

Mr. BACON hoped this last motion would not obtain. He did not know what there was in this petition to distinguish it from any other petition from any citizens of the United States. It was suggested that it involved a great Constitutional question. He did not know that this was the case. Anything might be made a Constitutional question. But he thought this question had been already determined by the whole Legislature on the most mature deliberation. He saw nothing to distinguish this petition from other petitions. He would not say that it would be doing it too much honor, but it would be making too wide a difference between similar applications to adopt this course. He was, therefore, for pursuing the common course.

Mr. GRISWOLD had no objection to a reference of the memorial to a Committee of the Whole. Perhaps that would be the better mode. It was true, as the gentleman from Virginia had stated, that a very important Constitutional question may arise on this memorial. Nor did he know, as represented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) that all the Constitutional questions involved in the subject had been settled by the decision of the last session. He had understood the gentleman himself, in his speech, during the last session, to have said that the question of compensation was a very different question from that then under discussion. He was not absolutely certain that that gentleman expressed such an opinion, but he was certain that some gentlemen of the majority did. As the memorial was couched in terms of great respect, he trusted there would be no objection on the part of the House to give it a proper attention.

Mr. RANDOLPH would concisely answer the gentleman from Massachusetts. Does this question involve an inquiry either into matter of expediency or of fact? With respect to fact, they were all agreed. The judges make the question turn on a construction given to the Constitution; it was, therefore, indubitably a Constitutional question, on which a committee could not decide. The House, then, must decide. It appeared to him to be the plainest case on earth. No doubt Constitutional questions may arise on many points. He hoped, therefore, the House would itself decide it. For his part, he considered the decision as already made. He hoped the memorial would be taken up that day.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH was decidedly against a reference to the Committee of the whole House.

Mr. SMILIE was against referring the memorial to a Committee of the Whole. If the subject had not been already maturely considered and discussed at the greatest length, he should be in favor of such a reference. But it had been most fully discussed. If they meant to sit there to the neglect of the important business, they ought to go into Committee of the Whole; but if they meant to do the public business, they ought not. Gentlemen should recollect the time spent in this discussion the last session.

Mr. DANA thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not calculate correctly. The same object, as to debate, would be attained in the House as in a Committee of the Whole. For he would recollect, that notwithstanding the length of the debate of the last session, and though the House were in Committee, no gentleman had spoken more than once; and, according to the rules of the House, every member had a right to speak twice.

Mr. DANA said that he agreed with the gentleman from Virginia in the ideas he had expressed.

Mr. GREGG said he hoped the motion of reference to the Committee of the Whole would not prevail, but that these memorials, like all others of a similar nature, would be referred to the Committee of Claims. He would beg leave to read to the House one of the rules by which the duty of the Committee of Claims was designated. The rule was in these words:

"It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Claims to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching claims and demands on the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House."

Now, said Mr. G., can any person, after hearing the memorials, and the rule just read, undertake to say, that they are not completely within the province of that committee? Are they not a claim? Are they not a demand for money? Most assuredly they are. He considered the demand of their salaries the primary object of the memorialists, and not an incidental circumstance, as had been stated. If the salaries had been paid, most probably we should have heard nothing of the memorial.

The question was then taken on Mr. RANDOLPH's motion to refer the memorial to a Committee of the whole House, and carried—ayes 53.

The SPEAKER inquired for what day it should be made the order.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, to-day.

Mr. GRISWOLD, to-morrow.

The question was taken on Mr. GRISWOLD's motion, and lost—ayes 38, noes 51.

Mr. HUGER moved that it should be the order for Monday. It must be evident, that the members had not yet sufficiently attended to the subject to be prepared for a decision. It was a very different question from that decided the last session. It certainly required some little time to enable gentlemen to revolve it in their minds. It was not usual to force decisions in that way. If it was the object of gentlemen merely to vote it out, a majority must do as they please; but if they were disposed to pay it ordinary respect, they certainly could not urge so precipitate a discussion.

Mr. RANDOLPH asked if it were in order, after the question had been taken, to name another day. He said he would not have urged an immediate consideration of the memorial, but for the conviction that the subject, in all its bearings, had undergone the maturest investigation, not only of every member on that floor, but of every thinking man in the United States.

The SPEAKER decided that the moving another day was not in order.

The question on going into a Committee of the Whole this day, was then carried without a division. Whereupon,

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the House should go into Committee immediately.

The SPEAKER said the unfinished business of yesterday would be the first acted upon, unless postponed.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved the postponement of the unfinished business till to-morrow. Carried.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the memorial—Mr. DAWSON in the Chair.

The memorial of William Tilghman was read; which was accompanied by ten other verbatim memorials, signed by Oliver Wolcott, Jeremiah Smith, Richard Bassett, Philip B. Key, George K. Taylor, Charles Magill, Samuel Hitchcock, Benjamin Bourne, Egbert Benson, and William Griffiths.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, he did not think it proper to enter into an extensive discussion of the memorial. The haste with which the consideration of it was urged, appeared to him indicative of a disposition to reject it altogether. Under such circumstances discussion would be useless. At the same time, he would remark, that it involved a question very different from that decided at the last session. It had, then, been decided that the Legislature had the Constitutional right to deprive the judges of all judicial power; but the question never was settled, that, notwithstanding the judges should be deprived of all their judicial powers, they were not entitled to the compensation guarantied by the Constitution. This involved a distinct point, which ought not to be hastily acted upon. The judges had never been heard before Congress on this question. They had a right by the Constitution to be heard, and to be heard by counsel, he presumed, if they desired it. He had thought the House would have given time for them to be heard. But they had determined to proceed immediately. He should, therefore, be content with moving two resolutions.

Mr. GRISWOLD here read his resolutions as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law to define the powers to be exercised by the judges of the circuit courts of the United States, who were appointed under an act, entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States."

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for submitting to judicial decision the right of the judges of the circuit court to their compensations.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, he would himself have preferred a resolution to make the judges compensation; but as they had thought it better to pursue a different course, he would follow their plan. He knew there were many respectable law characters, who thought the Legislature were competent to deprive the judges of their powers, but not of their compensation.

The resolutions were read from the Chair.

Mr. NICHOLSON did not mean to enter into a discussion of the merits of the memorial, for two reasons; the one because he was very much indisposed, and the other, because, in his opinion, the subject had already been sufficiently discussed. But as the gentleman from Connecticut who had moved the resolutions, in the first, recommended defining the duties of the judges, he supposed he had laid down some plan to that effect. As a member of the House, he would be much obliged to him for pointing out the plan he had formed.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, he had not expected to have been called upon to define the plan that would be most agreeable to him; as he apprehended that such a plan would lead to that discussion which gentlemen seemed desirous of avoiding. But he would mention one plan—to restore the law which the Legislature had, at the last session, attempted to repeal. The definition of powers, according to that plan, the judges might exercise with perfect certainty. If this were not conformable to the ideas of the gentleman from Maryland, it was in his power to define some other plan.

Mr. NICHOLSON said that this was just what he had expected; and he had put the question to draw from the gentleman such an answer. On the plan proposed, he was prepared to act, and he had no doubt every other member was also prepared.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, the provision desired by the gentleman from Connecticut already exists. The Legislature has defined the powers of the late circuit judges, and has decided that they shall not execute any powers. Those powers are transferred to other courts. Unless the House had changed their opinion, it was not necessary to go into any discussion on this point. The readiest and fairest course for gentlemen would be to propose to repeal the law of the last session, and restore the judges.

The question was then taken on the first resolution, and lost—ayes 34, noes 56.

The CHAIRMAN then read the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for submitting to judicial decision the right of the judges of the circuit court to their compensations.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he was not ready for the question. He had one or two remarks to offer, which had suggested themselves during the reading of the resolution. It had been repeatedly decided that the United States would not permit themselves to be brought into their own courts. Wherefore grant to a particular class of persons, in a single case, that which had ever been refused to the war-worn soldier of the Revolution; especially when it should be recollected that this case, involving the interests of judges, as a caste, could not be decided by any judicial tribunal free from bias?

A doctrine is advanced new to this House, which I have been told originated with an eminent character on the bench of the United States; I did not hear the gentleman from Connecticut distinctly, but I understand him as subscribing to it: that Congress may, constitutionally, deprive a judge of all authority, and transfer to another his powers and duties, but that the office nevertheless remains, and the judge, of course, entitled to his compensation. The Constitution says that "the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, for their services, receive a compensation." Without entering into a question which has already been so fully discussed, he would barely remark, that if the position just advanced be correct, the words "compensation" and "office," which the Constitution supposes, and every one believes, to have distinct and different meanings, must be convertible terms. For when the powers and duties are taken away, what, let me ask, is left but a salary? The word office must be rendered by the word salary.

The petitioners state that they are not actuated by a sense of their own interest, but that the public good is their sole object. I mean not to doubt their sincerity, but it is plain they are mistaken. This business involves only personal consideration—it has not a shadow of connexion with the public welfare. The Constitution renders the judges independent in a pecuniary point of view, in order that they may give independent judgments. In conceding that they may be Constitutionally deprived of the power of acting as judges, everything connected with the public weal is given up. If Congress can transfer their authority to other courts, it is a matter of private concern whether they continue to receive their salary. The public is no further interested than as to the amount which they are to pay. How strange, then, is it to hear men of the first standing on the bench say, and to hear it repeated here: As to the conduct of the judge, in which alone the public are interested, Congress may take it away—may transfer it to whom they please; but as to the salary, in which the public cease to have an interest so soon as the judge is divested of judicial power; as to the salary, in which the man alone is interested, it is sacred—it cannot be touched. That is, on every political revolution the existing courts may be to all intents and purposes annihilated, and their authority transferred to others, provided you pension the judges. When they cease to be judges, to have the power of deciding on our property, reputation, and lives, what, in the name of Heaven, is their salary, or their office, if you will have it so, to us? What concern have we in their pecuniary independence when they no longer possess judicial authority?

Mr. R. said he was every way indisposed to enter upon a long discussion of this question. That he had barely made a few observations on an opinion the most incomprehensible which he had ever heard. That his own mind had long been made up on this subject, and he supposed other gentlemen to be equally decided.

Mr. DANA was of opinion that every subject should be brought fairly and directly to a decision; and after it had been fully discussed and fairly decided, it ought to be considered as settled. So far as this subject had been completely decided, he had no disposition now to enter into the discussion. He fully agreed, too, with the gentleman from Virginia that to admit that Congress had the Constitutional right to take away the powers of the judges, was virtually to give up their claim for compensation, which only resulted from their right to office. Other gentlemen, however, were of a different opinion; and such an opinion may have been, and, he believed, was taken by some of the gentlemen who passed the repealing law. Such opinions, he knew, had been expressed by some gentlemen in public and in private.

The question of compensation to the judges involved considerations very distinct from those ordinarily decided upon in that House. Most of the individual cases brought here were made in pursuance of some particular law, and did not call in question the authority of Congress. If the case of the judges were to be referred to any tribunal, the right to refer was founded on the principle of controlling the decisions of the Legislature in case those decisions should appear to the tribunal to be unconstitutional. It was, therefore, in this view not proper to refer the question to a tribunal dependant on the body to be controlled. This was the only course that would probably be deemed impartial by all the parties concerned.

Mr. BACON said the true question was on the constitutionality of the repealing law. One Congress had passed a law constituting certain courts, which at the last session had been repealed. Now of what do courts consist? Of judges, who are officers of the court. The question is, whether by abolishing the courts, these officers are abolished. He supposed they were. He considered the terms as synonymous. Now the question is whether, if the offices are abolished, those who filled them before they were abolished are entitled to salaries? That is the only question that remains undetermined. What does the Constitution say? Admitting the offices abolished, it says: "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

Does it not follow that if they continue in office they are entitled to a salary for the services they perform. If they do not continue in office they are entitled to nothing, and the Constitution has no reference to them. This is the true question.

Mr. B. said he had been reminded of some observations made by him the last Winter. But he supposed that having determined the question that the offices were abolished, the other question of compensation was determined of course.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—Last Winter the gentleman from Massachusetts informed us that the right of judges to salaries was not involved in a decision on their powers. Now, he says by a decision of that question the present was decided of course. I conceive that this question never has been settled by the Legislature. Opinions entertained by different gentlemen have varied. It is the opinion of some very respectable legal characters, that though Congress may deprive the judges of all their powers, yet they cannot deprive them of their offices, and their characters of judges, and that they are still entitled to their salaries. Such an opinion is entertained by high and respectable law characters. I am not of this opinion, as hinted by the gentleman from Virginia. I thought that when we passed a law essentially impairing the power of a judge, we essentially impaired his office, and when we deprived him of all his powers, we also deprived him entirely of his office. But gentlemen of a very high and respectable character were of a different opinion. They may, perhaps, be correct; and so long as such opinions are entertained, an impartial tribunal ought to be established to decide the question. I cannot see any objection to such a tribunal. I have never felt an objection to transfer to the courts of law the decision of claims resting upon legal grounds. I always thought such a mode of decision proper, as I thought that whatever an individual conceived himself as having a right to by law, should be settled in a court of law. I have no objection to the reference of this question to the Supreme Court. I have, therefore, moved the resolution, and I hope it will prevail. As to the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that this claim exclusively relates to the personal interest of the judges, I conceive that is not correct. The judges consider the repealing law as unconstitutional; they, therefore, consider themselves as still judges of the United States. It is a principle guarantied by the Constitution that they shall not be removed but for misbehaviour. They believe it to be their duty to pursue every legal means in their power to vindicate that principle as violated in the repealing act. Believing that principle to be just; believing it to be sacred in the opinion of the people of the United States, how could they relinquish their claim to compensations—a necessary consequence of it—without relinquishing the principle itself? They could not do it. I do not, however, wish to go into an extensive discussion of the question, which I consider unnecessary, believing, as I said before, that by the course taken by the House it is settled that the resolution shall be rejected.

Mr. T. MORRIS said if he understood the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) right, who had spoken on this subject during the last Winter, he had said that not only every judge, but every justice of the peace had a right to decide on the constitutionality of a law. If that opinion was correct, and he still entertain the same opinion, he knew no reason why he should now object to the institution of an impartial tribunal. The judges thought one way, and Congress the other. The repealing law may be Constitutional or not. Why, then, refuse to refer the decision to an impartial tribunal? Believing this the most correct mode, he thought the application proper. But the gentleman from Virginia says if you allow a tribunal to the judges, why not also allow one to settle the claims of our Revolutionary soldiers? To this Mr. M. said he had no objection; though he did not think that in those cases they were so fully called upon as in this case. The former were principally appeals to the liberality of the House; whereas this involved a great Constitutional question. He understood, indeed, that such a provision existed in the State which that gentleman (Mr. RANDOLPH) represented, by which any individual, considering himself aggrieved, could apply to a court of justice, in consequence of the decision of which money could be drawn from the Treasury.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH said he did not propose to discuss, much less decide the question, whether the petitioners were entitled to their salaries, because he perceived a strong disposition in the House not to consider the petition on its merits, and because this was a question which the judges themselves did not desire should be settled by Congress, but referred to a determination of a disinterested and impartial tribunal. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had observed that this course would be unexampled, and that the Government might with equal propriety erect a forum to decide the numerous applications to this House for invalid pensions. Mr. S. said the very allusion made by the honorable gentleman had brought to his recollection a precedent which he thought not inapplicable to the present case.

He said it would be remembered that, at a certain period the judges of the Supreme Court were directed by an act of Congress to receive on their circuits the evidence of claims to invalid pensions, and report their evidence to the Secretary of War for his ultimate determination. Some one or more of the judges considered the act unconstitutional, as requiring them to perform a service not within the sphere of their official duties, and refused to execute it; the others discharged the duty enjoined, but under the title of commissioners. A question arose whether the proceedings of these commissioners were valid so as to entitle the claimants to the provision contemplated by the act. How was this question disposed of? Instead of putting an end at once to all doubts on the subject by a legislative decision, Congress directed the Secretary of War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, to take such measures as might be necessary to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States on the validity of any such rights as were claimed under that act. Here, said Mr. S., is a precedent for the measure now proposed, produced by an occasion of infinitely less importance, in his opinion, than the present. He considered the judges as standing on at least as high ground as ordinary claimants. They had been elevated to office not by their own acts, but by the Government itself; their salaries had been secured to them not for their personal benefit, but for the public good.

Mr. S. said he had risen merely to make these remarks, but being up he must be permitted to say, that during the time he had had the honor of a seat in that House he had never known any business precipitated in that manner. When the report of a select committee upon a petition of the most trifling nature was referred to a Committee of the Whole, on motion of any gentleman a distant day would be assigned; an order would be made for printing it, and in short the most solemn deliberation would mark every step of its progress. What had been now done? One hour had scarcely passed away since these petitions were ushered into the House, and we are now discussing them in Committee of the Whole. They were not permitted to be printed, and members of the House were uninformed of their contents except from the cursory reading at the Clerk's table. Mr. S. said he hoped gentlemen would be able to justify that procedure to themselves, but he did believe in a moment of calm reflection they would find it a fruitful source of pungent regret.

Mr. SMITH would ask whether the Supreme Court in such a case as this could be denominated an impartial tribunal? He asked if they had not seen the time when, during the disputes between the clergy and laity, no wise man, not of the clerical order, would have trusted himself in the hands of the clergy? The same remark applied to the military, and also, with equal force, to the judges of the Supreme Court. He really, however, thought that the judges would not receive the salaries, even if they were offered to them, as it would be contrary to every idea of patriotism. He, therefore, considered the application as a mere matter of form.

JANUARY, 1803.

Memorial of United States Judges.

H. OF R.

Mr. NICHOLSON said if this question had never before been argued, there might be some degree of propriety in the remarks of gentlemen, and the House perhaps might be chargeable with precipitation. But he begged it might be remembered that the very question embraced by the resolution now on the table had, at the last session, undergone the most ample discussion that ever took place in Congress. It had not only been argued here for a considerable length of time, but he believed it had attracted the attention of every reflecting man in the nation. A strange distinction, however, is attempted to be set up. At one moment gentlemen declare it is not the same question, and immediately after concede by their arguments that it is the same. They say that men of high legal character in the United States have granted that Congress have a right to take from the judges all power of acting as such, but deny the right to destroy the office. They may divest him of power, but the office must remain, and he is still a judge. To him this was a perfect absurdity. He could not possibly conceive the idea of a judge who had nothing to do; who had no duties to perform—no power to decide. These high legal characters supposed that he might remain a judge for the purpose of receiving his salary, but not for the purpose of performing any duty. This was not his idea, and both the gentlemen from Connecticut (Messrs. GRISWOLD and DANA) appeared to agree with him in opinion. In fact it was the great ground of dispute last session, whether you could repeal a law under which a judge was appointed, and thereby deprive him of his office by taking from him all the powers and duties of a judge. Whatever the opinions of high legal characters might be on this question, Congress had last year, after full and ample discussion, solemnly decided, that they had a right by repealing the law to divest the judges of their judicial powers, and thereby destroy their offices.

Another gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. J. C. SMITH) had alluded to a law passed some years ago, which assigned certain duties to the judges of the Supreme Court in relation to the claims of persons who alleged that they ought to be placed on the pension list. It would, no doubt, be recollected that the judges refused to carry this law into execution, and he might be permitted to ask what security there was that they would not now refuse to carry into effect any law which we might pass embracing the object of the resolution? Was it to be imagined that they would refuse to decide on the claims of those who fought our Revolutionary battles, and yet kindly attend to the claims of their brethren? The resolution contemplated giving the power to try the right of the judges to their claims; but the great object in reality was to authorize the judges of the Supreme Court to decide upon the constitutionality of the repealing act. Let this object, then, be avowed; let it be so declared openly, and not introduced in this incidental manner. From the remarks made last year by gentlemen on the other side of the House, it was a little surprising that this application should be made, for it was then strenuously contended that the Supreme Court had the right to decide upon the constitutionality of all laws. Why, then, ask for it? If they have this right we need not confer it; if they have it not, we cannot give it them. If the petitioning judges can bring their case before the Supreme Court, let them do so; my consent shall never authorize it. If the Supreme Court shall arrogate this power to themselves, and declare our law to be unconstitutional, it will then behoove us to act. Our duty is defined.

In his opinion, Mr. N. said the best method of trying the right of Congress to repeal the judiciary act had been for some time, and was yet in operation. The people constituted the great tribunal before whom the constitutionality of all laws of Congress should be brought, and by them this question will be decided. Some of them have decided, and the remainder will decide by their elections. It is an impartial tribunal, to whom we may all appeal, and their judgment will bind us. To their decision it is already referred, and with them he was willing to leave it rather than to any court of justice.

Mr. EUSTIS said when the office of judge was abolished, all his duties ceased. The salary allowed was a compensation for services. Now when there were no services to be performed, what salary could there be allowed, or what retribution demanded? On what did this claim rest? On the opinion of the judges. But by the decision of the last Winter their offices were abolished; it followed, therefore, of consequence, that their salaries ceased too. This was a plain and simple question. He considered the memorial as the protest of the judges against this decision. As such, he was willing that it should rest on the files of the House, and instead of being offended at this treatment the judges ought to be thankful. When he observed yesterday a memorial presented by an individual for a greater amount than the claim of all the judges, and observed how lightly it was treated, and particularly by the chairman of the Committee of Claims, (Mr. JOHN C. SMITH,) who moved the reference, he was surprised that he, above all men, should complain of the treatment of this memorial, which had been respectfully referred to a Committee of the Whole. Mr. E. concluded by observing that he forebore going into the merits of the memorial.

Mr. DANA said the ideas of the gentleman from Massachusetts were in one respect correct. The memorial of the judges was a protest against the law passed by Congress. It was proper they should make it, so far as they confined themselves to language not indecorous or disrespectful. He would admit likewise that the question of powers decided the question of salary; others, however, entertained a different opinion. Why object, then, in a case where there was a difference of opinion, to refer the decision to an impartial tribunal? The only question is, whether in a contest for power, you, the Legislature, will claim the exclusive exercise of power, and whether, even if you shall exceed the Constitutional limits you will assert the entire right of saying so, or whether you will refer it to a tribunal which shall be an umpire between those who hold different opinions?

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to amend the resolution. He observed that the judges of the circuit court were the judges of the Supreme Court and district court united. He therefore moved to insert before the word "judges," the word "former."

Mr. GRISWOLD, wishing to have the question directly taken, moved to add after "judges of the circuit court," these words, "appointed under an act entitled 'An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States, passed on the thirteenth day of February, 1801.'"

Mr. NICHOLSON agreed to the insertion of those words, with the addition of the following; which he moved, "which said act was repealed at the last session of Congress."

The amendment was carried—ayes 56.

Mr. ALSTON said the resolution required another amendment. As it now stood, it would appear that all the late judges of the circuit court claimed a compensation for services not rendered. He believed this was not the case. There were some of those judges who had made no such request. He, therefore, moved to insert the name of those who had presented memorials; also to insert the word "late" before the word "judges."

Carried without a division.

The resolution as amended stood thus:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for submitting to judicial decision the right of William Tilghman, Oliver Wolcott, Jeremiah Smith, Richard Bassett, Philip B. Key, George K. Taylor, Charles Magill, Samuel Hitchcock, Benjamin Bourne, Egbert Benson, and William Griffiths, late judges of the circuit court appointed under an act entitled "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States passed on the thirteenth day of February, 1801;" which said act was repealed at the last session of Congress, to their compensations.

On which the question being put, it was lost—ayes 35, noes 57.

Mr. VARNUM observed that the memorial contained two principles, both of which had been negatived. To draw the attention to a final decision he would move another resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition of William Tilghman, and others, (naming them) late judges of the circuit courts of the United States, ought not to be granted, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions.

Mr. T. MORRIS moved that the Committee should rise and report progress, that the petition might be printed. Negatived without a division.

The resolution was then carried without a division, when the Committee rose and reported it.

The House immediately took it into consideration; when

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the words, "late judges of the circuit courts of the United States."

Mr. GRISWOLD said he presumed it was not the object to expunge all evidence of these gentlemen being judges, or late judges of the circuit courts of the United States, and yet that would appear to be the effect of the motion. He must, therefore, call for the yeas and nays, which would make that fact be recorded on the journals.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he had made the motion that the resolution might conform to the prayer of the petition. Had the memorialists called themselves late judges, he should have had no objection to their being so designated in the resolution. His wish was to style them in the resolution as they had styled themselves.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, though they had not expressly styled themselves circuit judges, yet they had stated that they had been appointed circuit judges under a law of the United States. They had therefore virtually so styled themselves.

A few words were added by Mr. EUSTIS against it, and by Messrs. RANDOLPH and NICHOLSON in favor of striking out the words, when the question was taken by yeas and nays and carried—yeas 50, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, John Bacon, Phaniel Bishop, Walter Bowie, Robert Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmdorf, Ebenezer Elmer, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, John A. And then the main question being taken, that the House do agree to the resolution reported from the Committee of the whole House, amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitions of William Tilghman, Oliver Wolcott, Richard Bassett, Charles Magill, Samuel Hitchcock, Benjamin Bourne, Egbert Benson, Philip B. Key, William Griffith, Jeremiah Smith, and George K. Taylor, ought not to be granted; and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions:

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 37, as follows:

FRIDAY, January 28.

Mr. DAWSON moved the following resolution :

Resolved, That, during the present, and at the commencement of every session of Congress, two additional clerks shall be elected, to be denominated "Committee Clerks," whose duty it shall be to attend to the business referred to the several committees, and to keep records thereof; and who shall receive for their services an adequate compensation.

The question was taken, that the House do now proceed to take the said motion into consideration. and passed in the negative.

A memorial of the citizens of Washington, in the Territory of Columbia, signed by order, and in behalf of a meeting of the said citizens, by Robert Brent, their chairman, was presented to the House and read, submitting to the consideration of Congress a statement of grievances, which, in the opinion of the memorialists, now exist in the said territory, and require immediate remedy; and praying that they may be authorized, in common with their fellow-citizens, to elect delegates to a convention to establish a system of government for themselves, if such shall appear their sense, expressed through the organ of their representatives so assembled; or, if such shall not appear to be the sense of the territory, they be empowered to recommend to the adoption of Congress such other measures as shall, in their opinion, best promote the general welfare of their constituents.

Ordered, That the said memorial, together with the memorial and remonstrance of the inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, presented yesterday, and ordered to lie on the table, be referred to the committee to whom was recommended, on the twenty-fourth instant, the bill additional to, and amendatory of, an act, entitled, "An act to incorporate the inhabitants of the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia," passed the third day of May, one thousand eight hundred and two; and that Mr. TALIAFERRO and Mr. EARLY be added to the said committee.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide an additional armament for the protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of William Ray and John Follawell, which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

Mr. DAVIS, one of the members from the State of Kentucky, presented to the House certain resolutions of the Legislature of the said State, together with a memorial annexed thereto from the said Legislature, addressed to the President of the United States, and the Senate and House of Representatives of Congress, representing, that, in consequence of a violation, on the part of Spain, of an article of the Treaty of Friendship, Limits and Navigation, between the United States and the King of Spain, the citizens of the said State are deprived of a place of deposit in the Spanish territory, in conformity with the stipulation contained in the said treaty, by the proceedings of the Intendant at the port of New Orleans, who has, by a proclamation, dated the eighteenth day of October last, forbidden American citizens to deposit their merchandises and effects in the said port of New Orleans, without having assigned to the United States an equivalent establishment on another part of the banks of the river Mississippi; that they rely on the wisdom and justice of the Government of the United States to redress the grievance of which they complain, and pledge themselves to support, at the expense of their lives and fortunes, such measures as the honor and interest of the United States may require, in defence thereof.

The said resolutions and memorial were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for the relief of the proprietors of the Salem Turnpike road, in Massachusetts; which was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Col. Humphreys, late Minister at the Court of Madrid, stating that, when he was about to leave that Court, the Minister of State urged his acceptance of the customary present from His Majesty. Col. Humphreys informed him that he could not, consistently with the Constitution of his Government, accept the present. The Minister continued to press the acceptance, and urged that as he was no longer an officer of the United States, there could be no impropriety in his receiving it. Col. H. replied, that, though he was then out of office, there would still, in his opinion, be an indelicacy in the acceptance, and that if he should receive the present designed for him, he should consider it as his duty to deliver it into the hands of the President of the United States, to be disposed of at the pleasure of the Government.

Under these circumstances he left the Court of Madrid; and upon his arrival in the United States, he found a casket of valuable female ornaments addressed to Mrs. Humphreys, which, though unaccompanied by any letter, he presumed to be a present from the Queen of Spain. Doubting the propriety of accepting it under such circumstances, Mrs. Humphreys presented the casket to the President of the United States, who put into the hands of the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State declining to decide the Constitutional question, whether Mr. Humphreys could with propriety retain it, ordered it to be returned to him for the purpose of being sent back to Spain, or otherwise disposed of, as he might think proper. Mr. H. refused to receive it back upon such terms: it consequently remains with the chief clerk in the Department of State, and Mr. H. now requests Congress to give orders for sending it back to Spain, or for disposing of it in such other way as they may think proper. He makes the same request respecting a sword presented him by the Dey of Algiers, which is also in the hands of the chief clerk of the Department of State, under similar circumstances.

The subject after considerable conversation in the House, was referred to a select committee to report their opinion thereon.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of George Mason, a Revolutionary soldier. The report states that no provision appears to have heretofore been made for the allowance of pensions to soldiers of the South Carolina line, of which the petitioner was one; and concludes with a resolution that it is expedient to make provision by law for invalid pensioners of that line.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday.

Mr. MITCHELL made a report from the committee appointed on the subject of docks, that, under a law of the United States, fifty thousand dollars had been appropriated for docks, to be expended under the direction of the President; which sum, however, not being expended, had reverted to the Treasury. The report concludes with a resolution declaring that it is expedient to appropriate the same sum for the same object, to be placed under the direction of the President.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on a bill, in addition to an act fixing the Military Peace Establishment.

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to strike out the third section, which allows in the whole to the Paymaster, Adjutant, and Inspector of the Army, two thousand dollars for clerk hire. Motion lost—ayes 29, noes 40.

The Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment, which was ordered to a third reading on Monday next—ayes 33, noes 26.

MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. DAVIS said the War Department had pursued a method of granting military land warrants, in his opinion, not conformable to the resolves of Congress, granting a bounty in lands to officers and soldiers who served in the late Revolutionary war. He would not say that the practice was uniform, but as it related to his own personal application it was, and he expected it was so in all cases. He would be explicit. The War Department does not grant warrants to the representatives of any person slain in the service of the United States, unless such person was enlisted for during, or served to the end of, the war. It was his opinion, that the representatives of any person killed in the service of the United States were entitled to bounty land, whether they had enlisted for the whole of the war or for a shorter time. In this opinion he was not singular. He had spoken to two gentlemen from Maryland who appeared to accord with him in opinion.

Mr. D. said he did not expect the War Department would depart from their usual practice without some Legislative interference. He therefore proposed the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on the 29th ultimo, to inquire into the expediency of giving further time to the holders and owners of military land warrants to locate the same, be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, Legislative provision is necessary to carry fully into effect the resolutions of Congress of the 16th of September, 1776, and the 12th of August, 1780, which give a bounty in land to officers and soldiers who served in the late Revolutionary war."

This resolution was immediately taken up and agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS said there was another subject he was desirous of bringing before the House; it was the ascertaining how much land, belonging to the Virginia troops on State and Continental Establishment, was ceded to the Cherokee Indians by the treaty of Holstein, of the 23d July, 1791. If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the fourth article of that treaty, they will find a line is to be run, from a point on Cumberland river, a southwest course until it strikes the range that divides the waters of Cumberland from those of Duck river, forty miles above Nashville. This line, he said, went through the lands of the officers and soldiers of Virginia, a considerable portion of which fell in the Indian territory. By the same treaty, a very considerable part of the Holstein district of Tennessee was also ceded to the Indians—a part, too, that had been settled for years—such was the ignorance of the men who made the treaty of the geography of the country.

The Legislature of Tennessee and the suffering people remonstrated to Congress, and President Adams ordered a treaty to be held, by which the Indian title was extinguished, and the people quieted in their possessions. No representation has ever been made to Congress in relation to the military lands ceded away by this treaty. The United States, he considered, were bound to extinguish the Indian title to the lands before-mentioned. It was easy to ascertain the number of acres thus ceded away. Major William Croghan was the surveyor for the Virginia State troops. From his office a report could be procured, with little expense, which would show how much land belonging to the Virginia State troops was ceded by the Holstein treaty. Colonel R. Anderson was agent and Surveyor General for the Virginia troops on Continental Establishment. From him a report could be easily procured, which would show how much of that land was ceded to the Indians. He therefore presented the following resolution, viz:

“Resolved, That the committee appointed on the 27th ultimo be, and they are hereby, instructed to digest some plan by which it can be ascertained how much surveyed and patented land, belonging to the officers and soldiers of Virginia, on State and Continental Establishment, is ceded to the Cherokee Indians by the treaty of Holstein held on the 2d of July, 1791.”

This resolution was immediately taken up and agreed to.

DEBTS DUE THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DAVIS offered a resolution for instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of suspending, for a limited time, the collection of all debts or duties due the United States from the citizens of Tennessee, Ohio, Kentucky, and the Indiana and Mississippi Territories.

Mr. D. said, as the Government had lately passed a law suspending the payment of duties due by the citizens of Portsmouth, in consequence of a fire at that place, he thought the citizens of the Western country, from the peculiar situation in which they were placed, had an equal claim on the indulgence of Congress. The produce on hand was the means with which they had expected to pay debts due the United States. Many citizens in that country were indebted to the United States. If they were pushed by the Government while the port of New Orleans remained shut, and prosecuted for debts which they were unable to pay, from an inability to sell their produce, great embarrassment and uneasiness would be produced. On the other hand, if an indulgence should be extended until their ports were opened, the existing debts could be secured by counter-securities, under the direction of the Supervisor, or such other officer as Congress may authorize, by which the ultimate payment will be effected. He concluded by saying he was persuaded the United States could better afford to lay out of these moneys, than the citizens of that country could afford, under their present circumstances, to pay them.

The House immediately took up the resolution referred to, and agreed to it—ayes 58.

THE MINT.

Mr. MITCHILL, who had been appointed chairman of the committee on the Mint Establishment, in the place of Mr. DENNIS, (who had requested to be excused,) made an application to the House to report by bill. As he knew a diversity of opinion existed on the subject, and there had been some discussion already about it, he had brought the proposition before the House in such a form as to take their sense upon it. If there was a majority against the existence of the Mint, they would now have it in their power to show it by voting against the present motion. If there was, on the other hand, a majority in favor of the domestic coinage, it must be shown by granting leave to report a bill. That the House might the better comprehend his meaning, he would be a little more particular. The act concerning the Mint, providing for its continuance at Philadelphia, passed in March, 1801, would expire on the 4th of March, 1803. That day would soon arrive and it was desirable to have something done speedily. Unless provision was made by law, the Mint could not continue at Philadelphia—it must be moved to Washington. Money would be necessary for that removal. The Government now owned both real and personal estate in Philadelphia. If not occupied and employed there, legal regulation must be made for the sale of it. On the other hand, if it should be permitted to the committee to report, he was instructed to present a bill for continuing in operation the Mint Establishment in Philadelphia. By this means, the inconvenience and expense of breaking up this manufactory of money and moving it to Washington would be avoided, and the Mint would be continued at work at very little more than the ordinary appropriations. He wished this question had been settled by the House. The committee had been equally divided, and his casting vote had decided in favor of making the present application. In the present want of copper coin and small silver for change, he did not choose to take the responsibility upon himself of suffering the Mint to stop for the want of Legislative consideration and aid. The House ought to decide upon the propriety of the general question of discontinuance. He would however mention that, if leave was granted, it was his intention to report a further continuance of the existing law, and an appropriation of five hundred dollars, which the Director had declared to be necessary for purchasing horses and making repairs to the machinery.

Mr. DAWSON spoke against giving leave to the committee to report by bill; on which the House divided—ayes 45, noes 32.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. MITCHILL called up his resolution respecting French depredations, as follows:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire by what means the value or amount of property taken from citizens of the United States by the French during the late war in Europe can be best ascertained, and the several sorts of captures distinguished and classed, and report thereon to this House, to the end that indemnification be made.”

Mr. BAYARD offered an amendment, which was agreed to, striking out the latter part of the resolution, and instructing the committee to report their opinion whether indemnification shall be made.

After a very desultory debate on referring the resolution to a Committee of the Whole, or to a select committee, and the rejection of a motion of reference to a Committee of the Whole, the question was taken on the resolution as amended, which was determined in the negative—ayes 34, noes 39.

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 31.

Another member, to wit: JOHN FOWLER, from Kentucky, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

An engrossed bill for the relief of William Ray and John Follawell was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of the proprietors of the Salem turnpike road, in Massachusetts, was read the third time.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act authorizing the sale of a piece of land, parcel of the navy yard belonging to the United States, in Charlestown, in the State of Massachusetts, to the proprietors of the Salem Turnpike Road and Chelsea Bridge Corporation."

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, respecting the petition of Thomas Shubrick, of the State of South Carolina, referred to him by order of the House, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, stating that he has carefully examined all the papers in the Department which have any relation to the subject, but has not been able to find any documents that would enable him to form a correct opinion; and that to obtain such documents would necessarily require an extensive correspondence, of considerable duration, with the agents at Charleston and others.

The said letter was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, on the subject-matter of the seventh and last clause of an address to this House from the citizens of Washington county, in the Mississippi Territory, referred to him by order of the House, on the twenty-fifth instant; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the fifteenth ultimo, "as relates to our concerns with the Indian tribes, and the establishment of a new settlement;" that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred, on the twenty-fourth instant, a motion respecting the right of PAUL FEARING, the Delegate from the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to retain his seat in this House, made a report thereon as follows:

That the committee have, according to order, examined the matter thereof, and report the following resolution as their opinion thereon:

"Resolved, That Paul Fearing, the Delegate from the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, is still entitled to a seat in this House."

[Note.—Mr. FEARING had taken his seat at the commencement of the session, and the above report was never further acted on.]

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee on so much of the President's Message, as relates to Indian concerns, made a report containing four resolutions, viz:

1. For the continuance of the act for the establishment of Indian trading houses.

2. For the appropriation of ten thousand dollars to obtain further cessions of land from the Indians.

3. For the appropriation of two thousand dollars to purchase articles necessary for conducting salt works on the Wabash.

4. For opening an office for the sale of lands in the Mississippi Territory, to which the Indian title has been, or shall be, extinguished.

Referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for Wednesday.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter addressed to him from John Hargrove, Minister of the New Jerusalem Church, in the city of Baltimore, and State of Maryland, accompanied with a certain number of copies of a sermon, which he delivered in the Representatives' Chamber, at the City of Washington, on Sunday, the twenty-sixth ultimo, and now transmitted by him, for the use of the members of both Houses of Congress.

The said letter was read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the copies of the sermon transmitted therewith be distributed among the members, and that the Speaker be requested to acknowledge the receipt of the same.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the encouragement of learning, and the promotion of useful arts. After a discussion of several hours duration, on various amendments offered, the Committee rose, and the House re-committed the bill to a select committee.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. BAYARD observed that a resolution offered some days since by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. MITCHELL,) of considerable national, and of great individual importance to a large description of citizens, appeared to him to have been disagreed to more from considerations of form than substance; as the merits of the subject were not, on that occasion, brought into discussion. In order to meet the ideas of gentlemen who desired, in the first instance, to decide the principle whether indemnity ought to be made to our merchants, he submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, to indemnify the citizens of the United States who, in carrying on a lawful trade to foreign parts, suffered losses by the seizure of their property made by unauthorized French cruisers, or by any French cruiser, without sufficient cause, in violation of the rights of American commerce, during the late war between Great Britain and the French Republic, and whose claims for indemnity against the said Republic were renounced by the United States, by their acceptance of the ratification of the treaty lately made with France.

Mr BAYARD moved the taking up the resolution for consideration; on which the House divided—yeas 39 nays 45. Resolution ordered to lie on the table.

About 3 o'clock the galleries were cleared, and the House remained with closed doors till 4 o'clock, when they adjourned

TUESDAY, February 1.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and what, alterations ought to be made in the laws establishing the compensations of the officers of the customs; and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HUGER moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the Constitution, to wit:

That the State Legislatures shall, from time to time, divide each State into districts, equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives from such State in the Congress of the United States; and shall direct the mode of choosing an Elector of President and Vice President in each of the said districts, who shall be chosen by citizens having the qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and that the districts so to be constituted shall consist, as nearly as may be, of contiguous territory and of equal proportion of population, except where there may be any detached portion of the territory, not of itself sufficient to form a district, which then shall be annexed to some other portion nearest thereto; which districts, when so divided, shall remain unalterable until a new census of the United States shall be taken.

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NEWTON, one of the members from the State of Virginia, presented to the House the report of a committee of the Norfolk Chamber of Commerce, in the said State, as agreed to by the said Chamber of Commerce, on the 24th ultimo, stating that, in their opinion, "the remission of all discriminating duties on imports and tonnage towards the vessels of such European nations as conform to similar regulations, is calculated to unshackle commerce, leave industry to its proper impulse, and afford to this country that equal participation in navigation which may profit by its own enterprise;" that it will be proper to deny to the vessels of European nations holding or claiming the possession of any of the West India islands, the importation or exportation to and from the United States, of all such articles as are in those islands prohibited from being imported in American bottoms; in any other event, they consider a remission of the discriminating duties, as it respects those islands, highly objectionable.

The said report was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the 10th ultimo, a report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the 15th of December last, "as relates to discriminating and countervailing duties, and the act of the British Parliament on that subject."

Mr. MITCHILL, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to prolong the continuance of the Mint at Philadelphia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the quantity of fish exported from the United States; the amount of bounties and allowances paid; also, the tonnage of vessels employed in the cod and whale fisheries, and the duties accruing thereon, for the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one to one thousand eight hundred, inclusive, in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the 24th ultimo; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the 15th of December last, "as relates to the fostering of the fisheries of the United States."

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Moses White.

The report is favorable to the prayer of the petition, which prays compensation as aid-de-camp to a brigadier general, by brevet, during the Revolutionary war.

After a debate of considerable length, the report was agreed to—yeas 69.

The Committee rose, and the House immediately concurred with them, and ordered a bill to be brought in.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen. After making several amendments to the bill, the Committee reported the bill with sundry amendments; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. S. SMITH observed that, in order to allow the fullest time to obtain information of the public sentiment, he should not call up the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on discriminating duties until the second Monday in February.

JOHN HOLLAND.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the petition of John Holland, jun.

damaged by fire while in the hands of the custom-house officers, proportioned to the injury sustained.

An agreement to the report was supported by Messrs. S. SMITH, GRISWOLD, EUSTIS, JOHN C. SMITH, BACON, and JONES, and opposed by Mr. RANDOLPH.

On agreeing to the report, the Committee divided—yeas 62. Carried.

The Committee rose and reported their agreement to the report of the Committee of Manufactures.

The House immediately took up the report, concurred therewith, and directed a bill to be brought in.

WEDNESDAY, February 2.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Moses White; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of John Holland, jun.; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Resolved, That the committee to whom were referred the memorial of sundry citizens of the city of Washington, and the memorial and remonstrance of the inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, on the 28th day of January, be directed to inquire whether any, and, if any what, alterations or amendments may be necessary in the existing government and laws of the District of Columbia; and that they be authorized to report by bill, or otherwise.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported, yesterday, from the Committee of the Whole, to the bill supplementary to the "act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls," and for the further protection of American seamen, which lay on the table; and the same being twice read, were severally agreed to, except the third amendment, which was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

The said bill being then further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, agreed to, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

On motion, it was Ordered, That the report of the committee on the memorials and petitions of sundry citizens of the United States, and resident merchants therein, praying relief in the case of depredations committed on their vessels and cargoes, while in pursuit of lawful commerce, by the cruisers of the French Republic, during the late European war, made to this House on the twenty-second of April last, be referred to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-third of December last, a letter from Edward Tiffin, President of the Convention of Ohio, and a letter from Thomas Worthington, Special Agent of the said State, enclosing a copy of the constitution thereof, together with sundry propositions in addition to, and in modification of, those contained in the act of Congress, passed on the thirtieth day of April last, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to form a Constitution and a State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," made a report thereon: which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill making provision for persons who have received known wounds in the Revolutionary war.

A conversation took place between Messrs. GRISWOLD, HELMS, EUSTIS, MACON, and ELMER, on the adequacy of the provisions of the bill to the cases for which it was provided; when, on motion of Mr. EUSTIS, the Committee rose and reported progress; the House refused them leave to sit again, and recommitted the bill to the select committee that introduced it.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. HILL called for the order of the day on the bill to prohibit the importation of certain persons, whose admission is prohibited by laws of the States.

Mr. BAYARD requested the gentleman to waive his call for one moment, to enable the House to take his resolution respecting French spoliations, laid some days since on the table, into consideration, for the sole purpose of giving it a proper disposition. His object, some days since, when he called it up, was to have it referred to a Committee of the Whole House, not to urge its discussion on that day. His object was now the same, and his sole wish was that it should be referred, and a day named for its consideration. As, however, said Mr. B., it may be voted down now, as it then was, without any reasons being assigned, gentlemen will excuse me for calling the yeas and nays. I hope gentlemen will so far at least comply with the forms of justice as to suffer the case to be considered, whatever may be their ultimate decision upon it.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he would ask the gentleman from Delaware, whether he had seen any indisposition in that House to discuss the subject? For his part he had seen none, either in the House or in any individual member. He felt no objection to take up the subject at any time, and to discuss, or rather to hear the gentleman from Delaware discuss it. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would not persist in taking up the time of the House by calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD said he had seen an indisposition in the House to discuss the subject; and the reason why the gentleman from Virginia had not seen it was, that he was not in his place on the day he had before moved that the resolution should be taken up. Had he been in his place, he would have seen that a motion to take it into consideration had been rejected without a single reason being assigned. But under the assurance of the gentleman, that there was no aversion to consider the subject, he would waive his call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he spoke only for himself.

Mr. BAYARD replied that he then persisted in the call.

The yeas and nays were then taken on taking up the resolution; and were—yeas 65, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, James A. Bayard, Phanuel Bishop, Thomas Boude, Walter Bowie, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, John Campbell, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, John Dawson, John Dennis, William Dickson, Peter Early, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, William Eustis, Abiel Foster, Calvin Goddard, Andrew Gregg, Roger Griswold, William Barry Grove, Seth Hastings, Daniel Heister, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, David Holmes, Benjamin Huger, Samuel Hunt, Thomas Lowndes Ebenezer Mattoon, Thomas Moore, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Elias Perkins, Thomas Plater, John Randolph, jr., Nathan Read, John Rutledge, William Shepard, John Cotton Smith, Josiah Smith, Henry Southard, John Stanley, John Stewart, John Stratton, John Taliaferro, jun., Benjamin Tallmadge, Samuel Tenney, Samuel Thatcher, David Thomas, Thomas Tillinghast, Philip R. Thompson, George B. Upham, Joseph B. Varnum, Isaac Van Horne, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Thomas Wynn.

NAYS—John Archer, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Thomas T. Davis, Edwin Gray, John A. Hanna, Joseph Heister, William Helms, William Hoge, James Holland, Michael Leib, David Meriwether, James Mott, John Smilie, Israel Smith, John Smith, of New York, John Smith, of Virginia, Richard Stanford, Joseph Stanton, Abram Trigg, Philip Van Cortlandt, Robert Williams, and Richard Winn.

The resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole without opposition.

When Mr. BAYARD moved that it be made the order for Monday next.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS moved the 3d of March.

Mr. GREGG thought it was best to take the resolution up fairly and decide it at once.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said he was willing to meet it fairly, but he thought one day sufficient for the investigation.

Mr. HUGER had no hesitation in saying this was a question of great moment, and one well worthy of the deliberate attention of the House. To be sure, if there was a great press of important business, we would acquiesce in its postponement. But this was not the case. There was no business before the House of pressing importance. He was in favor of a fair and full investigation of the subject. The motion to make it the order of the day for the last day of the session, when the press of other business would absolutely preclude any attention to it, was tantamount to a refusal of all investigation whatever. Unless the motion was withdrawn, he would, therefore, call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BACON said his mind preponderated against the claim. But to him it appeared that a postponement to such a day, would be the same as declaring the claim should not be attended to. If the claim should be sustained by the vote of the House, it would surely require more than one day to make the necessary arrangements for carrying it into the shape of a law.

Mr. BAYARD.—No doubt the observation of the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct, that a postponement to the last day of the session is, in effect, precisely the same as to reject the claim altogether. Gentlemen ought to consider that our sole object is to bring into discussion the claims of our citizens. I do not undertake to express any opinion of the validity of the claims. No member on the floor is less personally or locally interested than I am. But I do think that no claim whatever, of the meanest nature, should be decided upon until the party is heard. Many of our citizens, who have incurred losses, suppose they have an equitable claim on the Government. The claims have been announced in the public papers, and in petitions on the files of this House. Is it then for this House to say they will not attend to the petitions of our citizens? For what do we ask? Simply for a discussion, and that a decision shall not be made until those who consider themselves aggrieved shall be heard. Are gentlemen unwilling to trust themselves, lest their own consciences should compel them to an act of justice? But I will abstain from going into the merits of the subject. I will only repeat that there is no petition, however worthless, but the House pays it a decent respect, by referring it, and allowing time for its examination. Will they then, in a case of such magnitude as this, where there are so many claims, so variously characterized, will they refuse this ordinary measure of respect? I will expect a different decision from the justice and candor of the House.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said he would withdraw his motion, and move that the subject be made the order of the day, for the first day of March, which would allow sufficient time for a full and fair investigation.

Mr. SMILIE did not know what the gentleman from Delaware meant, when he said we were not willing to trust our consciences. He hoped every gentleman had as good a conscience as the gentleman himself. For his own part, if there was time to discuss this subject, he would be willing to hear it discussed, and it would then appear who brought the merchants into their misfortunes, and who occasioned their losses. But, as he believed there was not now time, he thought it best to postpone the consideration of the subject until the next session, when it would fully appear who had been the friends, and who the enemies of our merchants. In the mean time he would only add that he would never be one of those who would consent to tax the agricultural interests of the country to pay the merchants.

Mr. RUTLEDGE observed that it was important that our merchants should be extricated from their present embarrassments. They wish to know the disposition of Congress on their claims. This cannot be done if the present motion obtain; for the subject, in that event, will be disposed of this session precisely as it was the last. It was then referred, at an early period, to a committee with whom it slept until near the close of the session, when a report, merely of facts, was made. The report was then made at a late day of the session, and the House never took it up. It is now proposed to be postponed until a very late day of this session, and it will then not be taken up.

Whatever the opinions of some gentlemen may be, it is a fact that many honorable and unfortunate merchants are now struggling with their misfortunes, produced by French spoliations, whom the hope of relief from Government has saved from ruin. They wish to know their fate, and no longer to be kept in suspense. Let their claims then be decided at once; and if gentlemen are ready to say they shall not be indemnified for losses, which, but for the renunciation of the treaty, they would have been indemnified for by France, let them say so. It is known that France would have indemnified for these losses, but for the treaty. The most respectable letters have been received from France to this effect; and Mr. R. said the fact was within his own personal knowledge. Under these circumstances the claims ought to be taken up and decided upon speedily. If the gentleman was serious in naming so late a day, the House must be troubled with the calling of the yeas and nays; as it was impossible to expect that anything that would be effectual could be done after the first of March, as all the measures adopted by the House required the concurrence of the Senate and the details of a law.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said he never permitted himself to propose anything to that House in which he was not serious. He was serious in his belief that if his motion should be adopted there would be full time allowed for an investigation of the subject. He was in favor of the distant day he had named, inasmuch as he was convinced that it would protect the House from the unnecessary consumption of a great deal of time, and which, if taken up now, would interfere with the transaction of much important business. Full time would still be allowed to decide the question of indemnity. He did not know that more was required this session by anybody. He had not heard any member say that a law would be necessary this session. All that was required was a decision preparatory to a law. In his opinion this was an improper time to discuss the merits of the subject; he should, therefore, make no reply to observations of this nature, which, he thought, had been improperly offered at this stage of the business.

Mr. BAYARD said he had not fallen into the same mistake with his honorable friend from South Carolina, in considering the gentleman from North Carolina in earnest in the motion he had made. He had not thought him serious, as the day named by him was so late as not to allow time sufficient for a fair discussion. The gentleman was not a new member, and his experience could tell him how imperiously the House were occupied, during the last two or three days of its sitting, in detail indispensably necessary to complete business already begun. He had seldom known the close of a session, when it had not been necessary to set on Sunday or till midnight. How then could it be expected that, at such a period, even the semblance of justice could be done to the subject? Whereas, if it were earlier attended to, they might consult their own convenience. If it happened, as had heretofore been the case, that they had more time than they knew what to do with, a much earlier day could be fixed on. But should the subject be postponed till the first day of March, it might be said, if the House should not then go into Committee on it, that a day so late had been named with a view of deferring the subject to the next session. While, if the House, actuated by magnanimity and justice, shall go into its consideration, it would put it in the power of a minority, or even a few members, to prevent the transaction of other important business. Mr. B. said he would not pledge himself; but he rather thought the subject could be discussed in the course of one day.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had mistaken him on the point of conscience. This was not astonishing, as that gentleman often made mistakes. He had said nothing about the conscience of that gentleman, as he knew nothing about it. He was asked whether gentlemen were unwilling to trust themselves, lest their own consciences should compel them to do an act of justice. This was all he had said, and it had not been said with any view to impeach the conscience of any gentleman on the subject.

Mr. BACON hoped this business would be so conducted as to show a disposition on the part of the House to meet these claims on honorable and fair principles, and so as to manifest no indisposition to a fair and full discussion. It was undoubtedly a serious question. There were a number of respectable characters interested in the decision—respectable, because citizens of the United States. He hoped their claims would be treated with all the candor and liberality they had a right to expect. He apprehended that two or three days were not sufficient, amidst the crowd of other business at the end of a session, for a fair and full examination. He should, therefore, vote against the motion.

Mr. DAWSON hoped the motion would prevail. A resolution in a great measure similar to that now proposed by the gentleman from Delaware had been offered some time since by a gentleman from New York. It was moved to refer that motion to a Committee of the Whole and negatived; afterwards a motion was made to refer it to a select committee, which was also negatived. He did conclude, from these decisions, that a majority of the House were not disposed to discuss the merits of the question this session. He believed this was still the sentiment of the majority, who considered the subject as not yet ripe for decision. He, therefore, thought the taking it up at an early day would only serve to waste time.

Mr. GREGG said, that so far as his mind was made up, he was against the claim; but he was, notwithstanding, in favor of a full discussion of it. The subject had been attended to. The committee appointed last session had gone into a laborious investigation of it; and had made a report containing very important statements and facts. He wished the consideration to be so far delayed, as to allow time for the printing of this report. He was against a postponement to the first day of March; but thought the second Monday in February would answer.

Mr. THATCHER said he felt gratified at the House manifesting more liberality in giving an opportunity now to discuss the subject than had been manifested before. Attempts made during the last session to discuss the subject had ended in nothing. This session, when the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHILL) had offered a resolution, it had been negatived. The motion of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) to take up the present resolution had also been negatived. But now a considerable majority were for taking it into consideration. He was, however, surprised at the motions for making the consideration of the subject the order of the day for the first and third of March, as they would in effect frustrate all discussion, from the press of other business. The subject was of infinite importance; millions depend upon the decision. The merchants were anxious to know the result. A state of suspense was, of all states, most painful to them. Why then put off the decision of a claim in his opinion just, and to which the House ought not to shut their ears?

Mr. EUSTIS said, whatever may have been the intention of the mover to postpone to the first of March, and of the intentions of gentlemen on this or any other occasion, he had no disposition to inquire—the tendency of the postponement will be to preclude a deliberate discussion. Those more conversant with the course of business knew, better than he did, the pressure of business which necessarily crowded the last days of a session; and he was more averse to the motion from the avowal of an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. DAWSON,) who had risen to support the motion, and avowed his principal reason to be a conviction that the present Congress ought not to take any decisive measures on the subject of the claims. He differed widely from that gentleman. Independently of the magnitude and extent of these claims, and of the situation of those concerned, the House were called upon by a sense of public duty to bestow upon them a cool and deliberate consideration, which on ordinary occasions was extended to applications of an individual and inferior nature. The common course of business brings this subject to view. It will be recollected that, at the last session of Congress, the memorials of the claimants were referred to the consideration of a select committee. That committee reported a state of facts, and closed their report with the following words:

“Upon the whole view of the case, the committee submit it to the House, to determine whether the Government of the United States are in any respect bound to indemnify the memorialists; and whether there be any ground for discrimination between the cases of losses sustained before the acts of the 28th of May, 1798, the 7th of July, 1798, and the 9th of July, 1798; and cases of losses sustained after those periods.”

From the late day of the session in which this report was made, no order was taken on it, no discussion was had. By this part of the report facts are offered for consideration; data are furnished; a discrimination, in point of time, and of course in point of merit, is made; and the final determination is submitted to the House.

A sense of justice to the memorialists and a strong sense of public duty require that we meet the question and come to a decision. Those who appear already to have judged the question may possibly see in the statements which have been made and the arguments by which the claim will be supported, reasons to alter their opinions. In any event, and especially after a discussion, in case of an adherence to those opinions they appear already to have formed, if they fail to produce conviction on others, the reasons on which they ground those opinions may be useful to the House, and will accompany and justify the vote they shall finally give. When the question shall be decided (and I hope it will be in favor of an earlier day than that moved for) I shall move that the report of the committee of the last Winter shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole, together with the resolution under consideration. It will be also proper at that time to give a second reading to the memorials which have been presented—the grounds on which they rest their claim will be brought again into view, and by giving them a free discussion and consideration we shall be better enabled to come to a just decision. These claims, like conscience, are of no party; the misfortune has been indiscriminate, and it is to be expected the final determination will be just.

Mr. HOLLAND advocated a full discussion, and the assignment of an early day.

When the yeas and nays were taken, on making it the order of the day for the first of March, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 74, as follows:

On motion of Mr. BAYARD it was made the order for the second Monday in February.

IMPORTATION OF CERTAIN PERSONS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prevent the importation of certain persons prohibited by the States.

The bill originated in a petition from the citizens of Wilmington, North Carolina, and is contemplated to guard, by the imposition of heavy penalties, &c., against the introduction into the United States of brigands from the French West India islands.

The Committee progressed in the consideration of the bill, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 3.

The remonstrances and the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the States of Pennsylvania and Virginia, west of the Alleghany Mountain, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying that Congress will adopt such measures as in their wisdom may appear proper and effectual, to secure to the petitioners and other citizens of the United States, the free navigation of the river Mississippi, of which they have been lately deprived by the shutting of the port of New Orleans, in virtue of a proclamation issued by the Spanish Intendant of the said port, without having an equivalent establishment assigned to them on the said river.

Ordered, That the said remonstrances and petitions be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

A petition of Amey Dardin, of the county of Mecklenburg, in the State of Virginia, widow and relict of David Dardin, deceased, was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for the value of a stud horse, called Romulus, the property of the deceased, which was impressed into the service of the Southern army under the command of Major General Greene, by order of James Gunn, captain in a regiment of Continental cavalry, some time in the month of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to provide for the granting of clearances to ships or vessels of the United States, lying in the river Mississippi, south of the Southern boundary of the United States, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Saturday next.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the same committee, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled

"An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Saturday next.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the "Act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen," was read the third time, and passed.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Lewis, his Secretary.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prevent the importation of certain persons, whose admission is prohibited by certain laws of the State governments; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto.

The House then proceeded to consider the said amendments at the Clerk's table; and having made some progress therein, adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 4.

A Message yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, was read, as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The enclosed letter and affidavits exhibiting matter of complaint against John Pickering, district judge of New Hampshire, which is not within Executive cognizance, I transmit them to the House of Representatives, to whom the Constitution has confided a power of instituting proceedings of redress, if they shall be of opinion that the case calls for them.

FEB. 3, 1803.

TH. JEFFERSON.

The said Message was read, and, together with the papers transmitted therewith, referred to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BAYARD, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. TENNEY, and Mr. ELMENDORF; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his report on the claims to lands for military services; also, on claims for duplicates of warrants issued from the Land Office of Virginia, and plats and certificates of surveys founded on such warrants, suggested to have been lost or destroyed, made agreeably to the second section of an act of Congress, passed the twenty-sixth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,'" which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-ninth of December last, "to inquire into the propriety of granting further time to proprietors or holders of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same."

IMPORTATION OF CERTAIN PERSONS.

The House took up the amendments of the Committee of the Whole to the bill to prevent the importation of certain persons, &c.

some gentlemen who had expressed their opinions, moved an amendment withholding its operation until the first day of May next.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke against this amendment.

Mr. HILL withdrew it.

Mr. WADSWORTH renewed it.

The amendment was supported by Messrs. THATCHER, DENNIS, S. SMITH, ELMENDORF, HASTINGS, R. WILLIAMS and BACON, and opposed by Messrs. RUTLEDGE, LOWNDES, CLAIBORNE, HOLLAND and RANDOLPH; and on the question being taken, was lost—yeas 36, nays 40.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS then moved to limit its operation from the first day of April. Carried—yeas 40, nays 37.

After a short debate, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday—yeas 62, nays 20, as follows:

NAYS—Willis Alston, John Archer, James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, Walter Bowie, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, John Campbell, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, Thomas T. Davis, John Dawson, John Dennis, William Dickson, Peter Early, Lucas Elmdorf, Ebenezer Elmer, Abiel Foster, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, William Helms, Joseph Hemphill, Archibald Henderson, William H. Hill, William Hoge, James Holland, David Holmes, Benjamin Huger, George Jackson, William Jones, Michael Leib, Thomas Lowndes, David Meriwether, Samuel L. Mitchell, Thomas Moore, Lewis R. Morris, Thomas Morris, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jun., Joseph H. Nicholson, Thomas Plater, John Randolph, jun., John Rutledge, John Smith, of New York, John Smith, of Virginia, Samuel Smith, Richard Stanford, John Stanley John Stewart, John Stratton, John Taliaferro, jun., Samuel Tenney, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Joseph B. Varnum, Isaac Van Horne, Robert Williams, Richard Winn, and Thomas Wynns.

NAYS—John Bacon, Phaniel Bishop, Robert Brown, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Davenport, Calvin Goddard, Andrew Gregg, Roger Griswold, Seth Hastings, Ebenezer Mattoon, James Mott, Elias Perkins, Nathan Read, Israel Smith, Josiah Smith, Henry Southard, Joseph Stanton, David Thomas, and Philip Van Cortlandt.

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time on Monday next.

CLAIMS OF GEORGIA.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, accompanied with his report and sundry documents respecting claims against the United States for services of the militia of the State of Georgia, in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the third of April last. he report is as follows:

The Secretary of War respectfully reports to the House of Representatives of the United States, that, in obedience to their resolution of the 3d of April, 1802, relative to the claims of the State of Georgia, for militia services, the Secretary has taken measures to obtain all such documents as relate to the subject, some of which were not received until the month of January past.

In the course of an examination of the various documents, the following facts appear, which, with the circumstances attending them, are considered as affording the best view of the subject, of which it is susceptible at this distant period of time. The muster and pay-rolls received from Lieut. Colonel Constant Freeman, who acted as agent of the War Department, in Georgia, at the time the services were principally performed, are offered as evidence of services actually performed by the militia of that State, for which compensation is claimed, amounting in the whole to the sum of one hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-nine cents; of which sum thirteen thousand one hundred and fifty-nine dollars and sixty-three cents appear, by the rolls, to be due to such corps as were specially authorized by the Executive of the United States, for services subsequent to 1793; the remaining sum of one hundred and twenty-nine thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars and sixty-six cents, is for services which were not considered by the Executive of the United States, nor by the agent of the War Department, as fully authorized by the General Government, and for which no payments have been made.

Sundry letters from the Secretary of War are offered as the principal grounds on which a decision may be made relative to the latter claims. On the 27th of October, 1792, the Secretary of War wrote to the Governor of Georgia, and gave him discretionary power as to the force he should think proper to employ, in case sufficient evidence appeared of the hostile intentions of the Creeks against the frontiers of the State.

On the 30th of May, 1793, the Secretary wrote to the Governor and authorized him to raise and organize one hundred horse and one hundred militia foot, to be armed and paid by the United States; which force, in addition to the regular troops then stationed in Georgia, and a suitable number of spies and small scouts, was considered as competent to the defence of the frontiers; and directed that whatever force might be employed, should be regularly mustered.

On the 10th of June, 1793, the Secretary wrote again to the Governor, and informed him that if the State was invaded, or in imminent danger of being invaded, the measures which he (the Governor) had taken, might be considered as indispensable; that he was the judge of the degree and duration of the danger, and would proportion the defence to exigencies; that the President had the fullest confidence that, when the danger which had induced the Governor to call out such large bodies of militia should subside, he would reduce the troops to the existing state of things. A letter, of the same date as the last, was written to the Governor of South Carolina, informing him that the President of the United States having received authentic information of the unprovoked and cruel outrages of the Creeks on the frontiers of Georgia, requested that he would, in case of a serious invasion by the Indians, and on the request of the Governor of Georgia, direct such parties of the militia of South Carolina to march to the assistance of Georgia, as the case might require, for the expense of which the United States would be responsible.

On the 19th of July, 1793, another letter from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia, states, as no information had been received at the seat of Government of any late depredations of the Indians, and as there was reason to hope that they would be brought to a sense of their crimes and induced to give up some of the authors thereof, the directions given in the letter of the 30th of May, still ought to operate. Captain Constant Freeman is mentioned as having been appointed agent for the War Department, who would regulate the issues of public property to the troops which might be in service.

On the 5th of September, 1793, a letter was written by the Secretary of War to Captain Constant Freeman, by which he was directed not to concur in any measures, at the expense of the United States, for invading the Creek country. And, on the 22d of February, 1794, another letter was written by the Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia, from which it appears that the President of the United States had been induced to believe that a greater number of troops had been employed than was necessary; and the Governor was informed that the General Government would not, except in case of an actual invasion, be pledged for the expenses, if in future any number of troops should be employed, which exceeded the force that the President had previously authorized, viz: one hundred horse and one hundred foot. He is also informed that, if it was expected that the militia were to be paid by the United States, it would be necessary that returns, muster, and pay-rolls should be made and delivered to Capt. Freeman, the agent of the War Department, in order that the whole case might be submitted to Congress, as the only authority competent for deciding on what proportion of the expenses should be defrayed by the United States.

By a letter, of the date of the foregoing, addressed by the Secretary of War to Mr. Habersham, Collector of the Customs in Georgia, who also had acted as an agent of the War Department, he is informed that the number of militia, which had been supplied in the State of Georgia at the expense of the United States, appeared by his representations to the War Department, to have greatly exceeded the number contemplated, and that one hundred horse and one hundred foot, in addition to the Continental troops, were considered as adequate to the protection of the frontiers against small parties of Indians, and that orders had been given for that number to the late Governor, dated the 30th of May, 1793, which number the President of the United States consented might be kept, upon certain conditions mentioned to the Governor. Mr. Habersham was then directed not to furnish supplies without particular orders from the proper department, to any greater number than one hundred horse and one hundred foot.

Copies of many other letters and extracts of letters are among the documents, which are not considered by the Secretary of sufficient importance to require particular notice.

From the preceding exhibition of facts, and from the other less important documents, and the circumstances connected with the subject, it appears that the actual services performed by the militia of the State of Georgia, in the course of the several years to which this inquiry is directed, for which payments had not been made, amount, in the whole, according to the rolls delivered to the agent of the War Department, and by him transmitted to that department, to one hundred and forty-two thousand five hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-nine cents. That such part of said services, as were performed under the immediate direction of the Executive of the United States, amounts to thirteen thousand one hundred and fifty-nine dollars and sixty-three cents; that from October, 1792, to May, 1793, the Governor was, by direction from the Executive of the United States, to employ such force as, in his opinion, should be necessary; that from the 30th of

May to the 10th of June, there was a suspension of his discretionary authority, and on receiving the letter of the 10th of June, he was again authorized to act altogether at his own discretion, as to the number of troops he should employ; and, until he received the letter of the 19th of July, 1793, he was authorized by the Executive of the General Government to employ such force as he should judge necessary for defensive protection, and that, from the general tenor of the direction of the Executive of the United States, he probably considered the United States responsible for the expense. Whether the Governor exercised the power confided to him by the Executive of the General Government with sufficient caution, or not, must depend on mere opinion. When the situation of the State of Georgia at that period is considered, having a thinly inhabited frontier, of about four hundred miles in extent, bordering on numerous hostile and warlike Indian nations, and threatened with a general invasion from one of the most powerful, which was actually committing frequent depredations on the frontier inhabitants, it is not improbable but that the Governor might have been induced to believe that a greater number of men were necessary for the protection of the frontiers than would have been considered needful by persons remote from the scene of action. At the time when these services were performed, a hostile disposition pervaded the greater part of the Indian nations within the United States; a serious war then existed between the United States and the numerous tribes of Indians, in the country Northwest of the Ohio, and a predatory war was carried on between the Territory Southeast of the Ohio, near the State of Tennessee, and the Cherokees, the expenses of which were principally defrayed by the United States; troops were also kept in pay, at the expense of the United States, on the frontiers of South Carolina.

As it would be impracticable at this time to ascertain with precision what number of troops was really necessary to have been kept in service at different periods in the State of Georgia, and as the opinion of the Executive of the United States appears to have varied on the subject, in respect to the degree of danger with which that State was threatened, and as the suspension of the Governor's discretionary power between the 27th of October, 1792, and the receipt of the Secretary's letter of the 19th of July, 1793, was but of ten days' duration, it is considered, by the Secretary, that the services of the whole of the militia, called out by the Governor of Georgia, in the year 1793, do constitute a just claim upon the United States, for pay up to the time in which the said troops could have been disbanded, after the receipt of the said letter, of the 19th of July; which probably could not have been effected earlier than the last of September; and when it is considered that they were spread over an extensive country, it may be doubtful whether the necessary arrangement could have been made and carried into execution at so early a period.

Under a full view of all the circumstances relating to the subject, the Secretary respectfully submits to the consideration of Congress, whether justice would not require an admission of the claims for all services performed for defensive protection, in the year 1793, up to the first of October of the same year, for which regular pay and muster rolls have been received; and whether the admission of the claim for like services, for which muster and pay-rolls have been received, for the other three months of the year 1793, would not, under all circumstances, do less injustice than would result from a rejection of that part of the claim? The services for which pay and muster rolls have been received up to the end of the year 1793, amount to ninety-five thousand nine hundred and seventy-one dollars and twenty-three cents, exclusive of the sum of thirteen thousand one hundred and fifty-nine dollars and sixty-three cents, due to the particular corps and spies, specially authorized subsequent to the year 1793.

What weight should, in this instance, be given to the provision in the Constitution "that no State shall make war unless in case of invasion, or of such imminent danger as will not admit of delay?" which is referred by the Secretary of War in his statement to the President of the United States, (as per document marked letter K,) and which the State of Georgia may consider as authorizing her claims, is submitted to the determination of Congress.

H. DEARBORN.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Feb. 3, 1803.

The report and documents were referred to Mr. EARLY, Mr. MATTOON, Mr. JONES, Mr. DENNIS, and Mr. TALIAFERRO, to consider and report thereon.

MONDAY, February 7.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Fairfield, in the State of Ohio, was presented to the House and read, praying revision and amendment of such acts or parts of acts heretofore passed by Congress, as relate to the terms of sale of lands, the property of the United States, within the said State; and that the petitioners and others who have purchased, or may hereafter purchase, the said lands, may not be liable to the payment of interest on the instalments due, or to become due thereon.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed, on the third instant, on the petition of sundry inhabitants and settlers on Mad river, in the said State of Ohio; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire in the town of Portsmouth," with an amendment, to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within the State of Ohio;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ALIENS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. SMILIE presented a petition from a number of aliens residing in Chester county, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying a more easy admission to the rights of citizenship.

Mr. S. moved a reference of the petition to a select committee.

Mr. DAVIS observed, that this description of persons had of late become extremely troublesome to the House. He was tired of their never-ending petitions. He had thought, that during the last session they had obtained what they wanted. As he was persuaded their admission to citizenship was now as easy as it ought to be, he hoped the House would turn a deaf ear to their requests, and in this way protect themselves from being further troubled. He was, therefore, opposed to referring the petition; and the more so, as it was impossible from the press of other business, and the late period of the session, to pay it any effectual attention.

Mr. SMILIE did not know whether there would be time conclusively to attend to the petition presented; but he considered it as of sufficient importance to refer it to a select committee. He believed this was only the beginning of many petitions that would be presented from the States of Pennsylvania and New York.

Mr. GRISWOLD called for the reading of the first part of the petition, which, if he heard correctly, contained expressions extremely disrespectful.

[The first part of the petition was read, which comments with severity on the principles and the measures of the late Administration.]

Mr. BAYARD perfectly agreed with the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DAVIS,) that it would be treating the petition with sufficient attention during the present session to suffer it to lie on the table. He did not know that referring it to a select committee would be treating it with respect; if it were, he did not know that he would be disposed to vote for it. It was allowed that it was impossible to attend to it this session. During the last session the alien law had been revised by the friends of the petitioners, or by those, at least, who called themselves their friends. Their admission to citizenship had been facilitated by requiring a residence of only five years. What more do they wish? Do they wish to enjoy full political rights before they can even read the Constitution? By going too far in making them citizens, we should take care lest we uncitizenize ourselves. Already they enjoy the rights of property and every personal security, and the only and ulterior right remaining is the right of election. Mr. B. said he had no objection to extending this right after a certain period. But it was certainly false policy before they knew the principles of our Government and laws to amalgamate them to the mass of society. To do this would be to introduce principles unfriendly to true republicanism. He hoped, therefore, the petition would be suffered to rest on the table.

Mr. SMILIE said there was one part of the prayer of the petition, which he trusted would be granted. The other probably would not be granted. He alluded to the prayer of those aliens who were obliged to signify their intention of becoming citizens, two years beforehand. He thought these ought to be relieved. He hoped, therefore, the petition would be referred. And if there should not be time to act upon it this session, it might lay before the committee. Mr. S. did not think this a proper stage of the business to go into a discussion of the merits of the petition, or into the policy of complying with their request. The gentleman from Delaware appeared to have serious apprehensions respecting aliens. For his part he had none. He believed that in the State in which he resided there was as great a proportion of aliens, as any other; and yet no inconvenience or evil had been experienced. The gentleman may, perhaps, think the politics of his own State not sound from the admission of aliens.

Mr. S. concluded by observing that though he thought it probable the Legislature would not shorten the probationary period for citizenship, yet he thought it would be best to refer the petition.

The question was then taken on referring it to a select committee, and lost—yeas 32, nays 49.

IMPORTATION OF CERTAIN PERSONS.

An engrossed bill to prevent the importation of certain persons whose admission is prohibited into certain States, was read a third time; as follows:

“Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That, from and after the first day of April next, no master or captain of any ship or vessel, or any other person, shall import or bring, or cause to be imported or brought, any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, into any port or place of the United States, which port or place shall be situated in any State which by law has prohibited or shall prohibit the admission or importation of such negro, mulatto, or other person of color, under the penalty of one thousand dollars for each and every negro, mulatto, or other person of color aforesaid; imported or brought into the United States as aforesaid, to be sued for and recovered by action of debt in any court of the United States, one half thereof to the use of the United States, and the other half to the use of any person prosecuting for the same; and in any action brought for the penalty aforesaid, the person or persons sued shall be held to special bail.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel arriving in any of the said ports of the United States situated as aforesaid, and having on board any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, contrary to the meaning and intention of this act, or of the laws of the respective States prohibiting the admission or importation of such negro, mulatto, or other person of color, shall be admitted to an entry. And if any such negro, mulatto, or other person of color, shall be landed from on board of any such ship or vessel in any of the ports aforesaid, on the coasts of any State prohibiting the admission or importation as aforesaid, the said ship or vessel, together with the tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the United States; one half of the net proceeds of the sales, on such forfeiture, to accrue and be paid over to such person or persons on whose information the seizure shall be made.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the collectors and other officers of the customs, and all other officers of the revenue of the United States in the several ports situated as aforesaid, to notice and be governed by the provisions of the laws of the several States now existing, prohibiting the admission or importation of any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, and they are hereby required and enjoined vigilantly to carry into effect the said laws of the said States, conformably to the provisions of this act, any law of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.”

Mr. BACON.—I am still dissatisfied with the principles of this bill. My mind will not be convinced; nor am I intimidated by any personal reflections or affected sneers; nor yet by any inhuman threats that can be uttered to supply the place of rational and manly discussion. Arguments of this kind, emanating from a source which generally commands my esteem, will have no greater influence on my mind than if they should proceed from a different, or even from an opposite quarter.

It is the principle of the bill that excites my disgust more than the immediate effects that will inevitably result from it; although these are worthy of serious consideration.

The bill in its principles is exceptionable in a variety of respects.

1. It makes a discrimination between the citizens of the United States, which is not only unknown, but repugnant to the radical principles and general tenor of the Constitution, which secures an equality of rights to our citizens at large. A number of the persons described in the bill are citizens of the United States; they were such previous to the time of forming the Constitution, and actually had a voice in the adoption of that solemn compact. These persons, by the provisions of the bill, are to be deprived of the common rights of citizens; they may not, in a peaceable manner, either for the purpose of commerce, or in case of distress, enter the ports, or sail along the coast of particular States, without subjecting themselves to severe penalties.

Admitting that but few, if any, of this description of citizens will ever be the actual owners of vessels, still they may have an interest, which to them is important, in being employed in navigating the vessels of others—their fellow-citizens. Be this as it may, they have Constitutional rights, of which Congress have not a right to deprive them. “The citizens of each State,” says the Constitution, “shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.”

2. It makes the same discrimination between citizens of particular States which it makes between citizens of the United States. While it admits of one description of citizens in each particular State, roaming at large by land or water through all the States, it prohibits another description of citizens of the same State even to enter the ports of some of those States for any purpose whatever. If one class of citizens in a particular State may be thus restrained, another may on the same principles; and thus all the citizens of particular States may be restrained in the same manner. This would be no other than to sacrifice the rights, liberties, and the property, of particular States, to gratify the wishes of others possessed of greater power and influence.

3. In another point of view the bill is exceptionable. It divests the citizens at large of a natural right, of which neither by their solemn compact, nor otherwise, have they ever divested themselves. It is that of applying their own personal labor to such lawful purposes as they choose, and of employing in their service such other persons possessed of equal rights with themselves as they may see fit, whether mechanics, seamen, or common laborers. And Congress, as I conceive, have the same right, and no other, to prohibit me from employing a citizen of this description to shoe my horse, or to labor on my farm, that they have to prohibit my employing him to navigate my vessel to any part of the world where I myself have a right to go.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Importation of certain Persons.

H. OF R.

4. With a view, as it is said, to prevent a particular crime, which is not even named in the bill, it prescribes a severe penalty to be actually inflicted previous to the commission of it—unless, indeed, it is made to be a crime for the citizens of one of the United States peaceably to sail along the coast and enter the ports of a sister State. It is difficult, however, to conceive the propriety of giving that endearing appellation to States—the interests of whose citizens are so hostile to each other.

In another view of the subject, it appears to me to be highly impolitic to pass a bill at this time. Without the spirit of prophecy, I can easily conceive the use that will be made of the measure, should the bill be passed into a law. Should that sacrifice be made of the interests and the Constitutional rights of the citizens, of a certain description, in some of the States, to gratify the wishes of the citizens of some other States, which the bill prescribes, this conduct of the Legislature would be represented by some, and believed by too many, to furnish ample proof of the sovereign and despotic sway of the "Ancient Dominion" over most of the other States in the Union. In this case such a representation might be made with greater plausibility than many others, which have obtained too much credit in various parts of the country. I am sensible that nothing can be more unfounded than an allegation of this kind. I am also sensible that the subject of this bill does not originate from Virginia. Yet such is the complexion, and such the real principles of the bill, that should it be suffered to pass into a law, it would, in many instances at least, be difficult, if not impossible, to convince, even the most unbiassed and discerning mind, that no undue influence from any quarter had made its entrance within the walls of Congress. It is easy to see that nothing can have a more direct and powerful tendency to a dissolution of the Union, than the prevalence of a sentiment like this among our citizens.

Mr. MOTT opposed the bill on the ground of unconstitutionality.

Mr. MITCHELL moved that the bill be recommended in order to receive certain amendments, of which he thought it stood in need, and without which he declared he could not vote in its favor. It was true, that, a few days ago, he did vote for the engrossment of the bill, but he did not consider himself bound thereby to vote for the passing of it. He did it that the gentlemen who were particularly anxious for its success might meet with no obstruction from him. But now the question was about to be put for the passing of the bill, he must either vote against, or propose several amendments. He did not wish to vote against this or any other bill, providing for the security of the Union. He was very desirous of guarding the States of the nation from the introduction of the negroes, mulattoes, and persons of color, comprised in the bill; he would add his wish to guard the country from all other mischievous and evil-disposed people. But while we were thus providing against one evil, he thought the bill, as it now was presented to the House, precipitated us into another.

Mr. M. then particularly commented upon the first section of the bill, which inflicts a heavy punishment upon any captain, or master of a vessel, that shall bring any negro, mulatto, or person of color, into any port of the United States, lying within a State which has prohibited the same. As far as this respected the trade in human beings, carried on to the rivers Senegal or Gambia, or other parts of the slave coast of Africa, it met with his most hearty approbation. He was desirous of putting an end to this detestable traffic, and of punishing in an exemplary manner such citizens of the United States as could be convicted of the crime of being engaged in it. A person undertaking this unlawful commerce, went into it voluntarily, forewarned, and in defiance of the laws, and was properly the subject of harsh punishment. Toward such he would exercise Legislative coercion and rigor in their severest operation. If the section stopped here, he believed he should be willing to give it his vote. But he observed that it went a great deal further, and included a case very different from the African slave trade, in its origin, motives, and accompaniments. This was the importation of persons of color from the French West Indies, who had been forcibly put on board an American vessel. Such a case had happened at Boston; something of the like kind had rendered New York uneasy during the last Summer, as he had stated at large in a former part of the debate a few days ago. In these instances the master of a United States ship, engaged in lawful trade, is compelled to receive on board some of the banditti or brigands of the islands. They are crowded upon him contrary to his inclination. He receives them at his peril, and brings them, perhaps at the hazard of his own safety, and that of his crew, into the harbor of his destination. On arriving there, after all this ill usage and peril, this innocent man is made the object of prosecution. He is sued, held to bail, found guilty, fined, and probably imprisoned. His ruin is almost inevitable. What remedy has he? If he puts these outcasts of society to death, our own laws will hang him for the crime. It would be easy for him to suffocate or strangle them in pestilential air. There would be no difficulty in throwing them overboard. There are many other methods of getting rid of them. But the captain, if convicted of disposing of them in either of these ways, would be adjudged a felon in our courts of admiralty, and suffer death accordingly. Thus, by the operation of the first section of the bill, a master of a vessel, after being treated at a most unneighborly and ungracious rate, in having a parcel of the most flagitious of mortal creatures forced on board him, must either put the wretches to death, and be destroyed himself by a criminal prosecution, or bring them into port and be ruined by the execution of civil process. In such an instance he could not perceive guilt; and where he did not discover guilt in the captain, he could not reconcile it to his duty and feelings to denounce punishment.

Mr. M. concluded this part of his speech by expressing his desire to recommit the bill, that he might move a proviso at the end of it to this effect: "That on the trial of the issue in any such suit, it should be lawful for the defendant to give in evidence that he received such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, on board by duress and compulsion, and brought them into port contrary to his will and intention." This he thought would draw the line of distinction between the captain, who went to Africa in quest of slaves, and him that had free persons, or slaves of color, thrust forcibly upon his deck in the West Indies. He said he should not recapitulate his remarks on the practice of nations to send their turbulent and seditious citizens or subjects into banishment, as delivered on a former day of the debate.

Mr. M. said further, that he wished to propose an amendment to the second section of the bill. This section was intended to prevent the landing of persons of color brought into port, and declared a forfeiture of the vessel and cargo from which such new comers should be disembarked. This was a heavy penalty upon the master and the owners. They might all be innocent, and yet be the sufferers by such a provision as this. This, however, he could consent to if the public welfare required it. But it appeared to him that a new clause ought to be added to the section, or a new section to the bill, to make the remedy intended by the bill complete. As it now stood, the penalty was inflicted upon one party in the transaction only—the sellers or importers. He thought the buyers or purchasers on shore ought to be included also. Where there were no buyers there could be no sellers. The persons, therefore, who encouraged this iniquitous trade in slaves, by paying a price for them on or before landing, should not be passed over. By enacting a penal clause for them, the whole of the parties in the transaction would be included, and the temptation to the offence, and the likelihood of its occurrence, be greatly lessened. He therefore wished to propose an amendment to the second section to this effect: "That every purchaser of a negro, mulatto, or other person of color, so landed, should, for each offence, forfeit five hundred dollars, with costs of suit, to be recovered by an action of debt, the one-half to the use of the prosecutor, and the other half to the United States."

Unless these or similar amendments were made, Mr. M. declared he could not give the bill his vote. He was desirous for a recommitment, that it might undergo some such modification. He should not repeat what had just been said against the bill on the ground of expediency by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) and on the score of constitutionality by a gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. MORR.) Being anxious that the country should be protected against these outlaws and exiles, by every means consistent with our Constitution and principles, he hoped the gentlemen who were equally solicitous with himself would vote with him in a motion which he then made "to commit the bill to a select committee."

This motion was supported by Messrs. NICHOLSON, ELMER, SMILIE, GREGG, and S. SMITH; and opposed by Messrs. DAVIS, HILL, EARLY, and RANDOLPH.

Those who supported the motion to recommit, urged it upon different grounds; some on the ground that the bill was unconstitutional in destroying and abridging the rights of free negroes and persons of color, who were citizens of one State, by prohibiting under the severe penalty of one thousand dollars, and the forfeiture of the vessel carrying them, their importation into certain States; others, on the ground that though this and other provisions of the bill were not unconstitutional, yet they would operate upon particular descriptions of persons with great and unjust severity. All allowed the propriety of the General Government exerting every legitimate authority it possessed to enforce the State laws, and to avert the evil apprehended from the introduction of brigands from the West India Islands.

The opponents of the commitment insisted on the passage of the bill as it stood. They acknowledged that its penalties were rigorous; but they were only such as the imminent danger of the Southern States called for. They vindicated the constitutionality of the law, by observing that it only prevented the importation of negroes and persons of color into those States which had already prohibited their admission.

When the question was taken on recommitting the bill to a Committee of the Whole, and lost—yeas 42, nays 46.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved to recommit it to a select committee. Carried—yeas 47, nays 42.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION, &c.

Mr. S. SMITH moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the granting of clearances to the ships or vessels of the United States, lying in the river Mississippi, south of the Southern boundaries of the United States, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes."

Mr. BAYARD said he would make a motion that would supersede that of Mr. S. SMITH, viz: that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order to take up the proposition of amendment to the Constitution respecting the election of a President and Vice President, laid some time since on the table.

Messrs. LEIB and HUGER supported, and Messrs. JONES and DAVIS opposed this motion, which was lost—yeas 34, nays 54.

Mr. BAYARD gave notice that he would renew his motion to-morrow.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill above stated.

Sundry amendments being made, the Committee rose and reported the bill. The House concurred in the amendments, and ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to the Militia, made a report with an accompanying bill.

The report states the system adopted by the act of 1792, to be, in the opinion of the committee, founded on a correct construction of the Constitution, and well adapted to the circumstances of the United States; and concludes with a resolution requesting the President of the United States to address a letter to the Executives of the several States urging a more vigorous execution of the law.

The accompanying bill provides for some deficient details in the law of 1792.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

TUESDAY, February 8.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences to which they have been and are now subjected, in case of the fees allowed by law to the marshal, clerks, and attorneys, of the courts in the said district; and praying that the same may be reduced, for the reasons therein specified; also, that an additional session of the Circuit Court for the county of Alexandria, may be directed, by law, to be holden on the fourth Monday of March, in each year.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee to whom were referred, on the twenty-eighth ultimo, the memorials of the citizens and inhabitants of the City of Washington, and of the said town of Alexandria.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth of December last, presented a bill further to alter and establish certain post roads, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William Henry Harrison, President of the Convention held in and for the Indiana Territory of the United States, at Vincennes, in the month of December last, transmitting a copy of the proceedings of the said Convention relative to the suspension for ten years, on the part of the said Territory, of the sixth article of the ordinance of Congress under the former Government, of the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven; which were read, and referred to Messrs. RANDOLPH, GRISWOLD, R. WILLIAMS, L. R. MORRIS, and HOGE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial and petition of the inhabitants of the said Indiana Territory, signed by order, and in behalf of a convention of the said inhabitants, by William Henry Harrison, the President thereof, was presented to the House and read, stating various matters therein specified and recited, which, in the opinion of the memorialists, deserve the consideration of Congress; and praying that the propositions submitted by the memorialists may be adopted, for the convenience and benefit of the people of the said Territory.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to the select committee last appointed.

An engrossed bill to provide for the granting of clearances to ships or vessels of the United States, lying in the river Mississippi, south of the Southern boundary of the United States, and therein to amend an act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio," was read twice, and committed to Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. THOMAS MORRIS, Mr. ELMER, Mr. JACKSON, and Mr. HEMPHILL.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire, in the town of Portsmouth;" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendment be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

ALIENS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

The following memorial was presented by Mr. LEIB:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States: The memorial of the alien inhabitants of Chester county, Pennsylvania, respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialists, during the last session of Congress, took the liberty of addressing you, entreating a repeal of the naturalization law.

That, whilst your memorialists feel the deepest and most grateful sense of your wisdom and goodness in repealing the most oppressive of the disabilities of that severe act, they cannot, in justice to themselves, refrain from deferentially expressing their regret that the present law should, to so high a degree, tend to prevent them from enjoying the benefits of the Constitution.

That your memorialists submit the circumstances under which those of them residing here from the Summer of 1798 until the Spring of 1801 were placed. Every alien distinguished for his attachment to the principles of liberty was incessantly abused in the papers countenanced by the Administration then in power. The American Minister at St. James's notified, in the name of his Government, that the Irish state prisoners would not be permitted to reside in this country. And the British Government made this the pretext for detaining them in dungeons for the space of four years, in open violation of a solemn compact. The Presidency was at that time in the hands of a man notoriously hostile to aliens or republican principles. And the President was authorized by law to banish any alien at his pleasure, without trial or without appeal. Under these circumstances, your candor will allow that an alien resident could have little inducement to declare his intention of being a citizen. For, by so doing, he placed his name on a list of proscription, and subjected himself to banishment, at the arbitrary will of an individual.

H. OF R.

Aliens in Pennsylvania.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

That your memorialists do most respectfully presume to suggest to the wisdom and justice of Congress that the poorest emigrant who arrives here has a property in his life, in his liberty, and in his labor, and is as liable to the laws as the richest citizen. That to tax him, imprison him, or put him to death by laws, in the framing of which he was not represented, is to exercise against him an act of tyranny. Though this doctrine, viewed in the abstract is sound, and though the venerated example of America, who justified her resistance to Britain on this precise footing, gives it sanction, yet your memorialists are aware that, in the internal regulations of States, it may, nay, ought to be subject to some modification.

That your memorialists, with all due submission, conceive that society would be sufficiently secured and right sufficiently preserved, by admitting such aliens to immediate enfranchisement as adduced satisfactory proofs of pure moral character; evidence of having paid taxes towards the support of Government, and of attachment to its form, with a renunciation of his allegiance to any other, and a declaration of his intention of permanently residing in this country.

That, whilst your memorialists glory in the privilege of speaking to the great council of the nation of their rights as men, they would not, merely on these rights, however sacred, rest their cause or their claims. They would appeal to your justice and to your policy as well as to their rights.

Your memorialists believe that a considerable majority of their number might, without regard to abstract right, lay their claim on plighted faith. This majority are the natives of Ireland—an ill-starred country, to whose inhabitants slavery was more intolerable, after seven hundred years of diversified cruelties and oppressions, because they still retained a love for, and still could appreciate the value of, freedom. Congress, struggling for independence, condoled with them; warmly acknowledged the services of Irish patriots to the cause of "Humanity and America;" eagerly invited them to partake of their country and of their success; and the countrymen of Montgomery have never, by their conduct in war or their votes in peace, proved unworthy of the blessing.

That your memorialists, respectfully appealing to the policy of the measure, request leave to observe, that those who have sacrificed their country and all the charities which render country dear to man, for the principles on which your Constitution is founded, are not to be undeserving of the trust and of the functions of citizenship.

Your memorialists farther beg leave to adduce the example of the enlightened State in which they have the happiness to live, as well as of the others which were the mildest in their laws, and most liberal in their institutions respecting foreigners. It is believed that they are not inferior in attachment to the American Union, in morals, in freedom, in arts, industry, or prosperity, to any of their sister States. In the rapid increase of population, which affords strength and security to your young and enviable form of Government, they are the foremost. For, by their Constitutions, the stranger of good conduct, after two years residence, was to be a citizen, and in these he then hoped to find a home.

Spain sunk by the expulsion of the Moors; France expelled the Huguenots, and England and Ireland established their staple manufactures. Encourage your aliens, you will have the arts and manufactures of Europe; neglect us, we suffer, but you are not served.

Your memorialists, therefore, pray that you may, in your wisdom and goodness, admit to citizenship those who are now excluded by default, on account of not having made a declaration three years previously of their intention, and that you may restore the time of two years residence specified by the law originally enacted to establish an uniform rule of naturalization.

FRANCIS ALISON,
and others.

Mr. DAVIS said that petition was similar to one offered yesterday by another gentleman from Pennsylvania. (Mr. SMILIE,) and he was surprised that any gentleman would bring forward another of the same nature, after the treatment that one had received. He had no idea of encouraging those restless people to intrude on the House. They were not well disposed people who could send a petition to Congress which derogated from our national character. He begged that the reading of it might cease, and that the House should go to business of more importance.

Mr. LEIB moved that it should be referred to a select committee.

Mr. VARNAM hoped it would not be referred to a select committee. Whatever might have been the difference of political opinion in this country, it did not become aliens who were asking favors, and on whom many benefits had been already conferred, to make such remarks as were contained in those memorials presented to the House yesterday and this morning. He hoped the House would immediately decide against them.

Mr. THATCHER thought the petition ought not to be referred to a select committee; it would reflect disgrace upon the House to refer to a committee a petition couched in very indecent terms, and whose principal object appeared to be to criminate the late Administration. As it was precisely like the one offered yesterday, and the House had been told that many others were expected, it was time to give their decided disapprobation of the sentiments, as well as the disrespectful manner, in which the petition was expressed. He thought these people paid a very ill compliment to the majority of the House in attempting to obtain their favor by abuse of the late Administration.

It would be recollected that, early in the session, the House had manifested great uneasiness even at the reading of a memorial from a late officer of the Government, (Mr. McHenry,) though expressed in very respectful terms. Certainly those gentlemen who, upon that occasion, discovered so much sensibility for the honor of the House, would not feel less when these restless aliens importuned them in language extremely abusive. He did not object to the commitment merely on account of the abuse of the former Administration. He should have objected had the same language been used with respect to the present. There was a dignity attached to the Government and the

H. OF R.

Representatives of the nation, which those aliens should be taught to respect, and which rendered such language inadmissible.

Mr. S. SMITH said, it had been usual to refer petitions which had been presented to Congress to a committee, who would report in whole or in part, as their discretion should direct. He had observed, that some parts of the memorial were not so agreeable; and that there were others which deserved attention. The gentleman from Massachusetts, last up, (Mr. THATCHER,) had adverted to a memorial from a late officer of Government, (Mr. McHenry.) He was not present when that memorial was read, but he could never see the drift of it, unless it was to have it printed, in order that it might go forth to the world, and, perhaps, create a prejudice against the present Administration. The gentleman had said, that his opposition to the petition would be the same, had it made a similar reference to the present as it had to the former Administration. How that could be his sentiment, when he had, on a certain occasion, during the present session, declared, by his solemn vote, that he had no confidence in the Executive, he was at a loss to determine.

Mr. THATCHER did not know what had led the gentleman (Mr. S. SMITH) to conclude that the late Secretary's object in presenting his memorial to the House, was to have it printed. If he had been present he would have known that there was no attempt, in the House, to print, nor even a motion to commit it. Although he considered the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) out of order in recurring to the votes respecting the affairs of New Orleans, he would take the liberty to observe, that the vote which he alluded to was forced upon the minority. That gentleman, with whom he had the honor to vote on that occasion, stated to the House several very important objections to that clause of the resolution presented by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) one of which was, that it pledged the House of Representatives to wait the issue of such measures as the Executive should have adopted, without knowing what they were. He believed that many gentlemen in the majority had since found reason to doubt the policy of their vote upon that occasion.

Mr. SMILIE said, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER) had stated strong objections to some of the expressions of the petition. He acknowledged there were some things which he wished had not been inserted; but if some parts of it were wrong, why should they reject the commitment of those parts which were unexceptionable? He would just mention the situation of those people in the year 1798, and 1799, when the alien law was in operation. When he considered the feelings those people must have experienced from their situation at that time, he thought there was some excuse for them. He believed every fact stated in the petition was true. Their situation, under the alien law, was truly dreadful. They were at the mercy of the President, and liable to be banished from the country upon the complaint of a single individual. Whatever the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. THATCHER) might think, he thought, for himself, that his declaration, by a solemn vote, that he had no confidence in the Executive, was quite as insulting as anything contained in that petition.

Mr. ELMER hoped it would not be referred to a committee. He thought the gentleman (Mr. LEIB) who presented it, was wrong, after what had taken place yesterday. That petition, he said, was not of the nature which ought to have come from aliens. He would do everything for that class of people which humanity and policy would justify; but they were not to insult that House nor the nation. When they thus reflected on the Government, they should have recollected that every Government claimed, or ought to claim, the right of regulating its own concerns. He had no idea that such language should be addressed to American Representatives.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he never recollected an instance of his voting against the reference of any petition to a committee, until yesterday. He thought that every man in this country, whether owing a temporary or a permanent allegiance to the Government, had a right to petition the Legislature for redress of grievances, and to state such remedies as, in his opinion, would remove the evils complained of. When, however, he admitted this right, he considered that it ought to be exercised with decency, and that the petitions should be couched in respectful and unoffensive language. The petition now proposed to be referred, was similar in every respect to that offered yesterday, and in both of them he found an intemperance of language which this House ought not to countenance. He thought it highly disrespectful to the House to address them by impeaching the principles of any former Administration. The petition declared that the gentleman who formerly presided over the councils of this nation, was notoriously hostile to all aliens of republican principles. This was a language which individuals, to be sure, had a right to use out of doors, but it was highly disrespectful to the House to make it a part of a petition, and it was a respect which the House owed to themselves, to show their disapprobation. Foreigners, as well as citizens, had a right to petition; but the petitions of both ought to respect the feelings of every part of the House. He should, therefore, vote against referring the petition.

Mr. CLAIBORNE wished the Clerk might proceed with the reading; he could then judge of its merits.

The petition was read through.

Mr. LEIB called for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, as the yeas and nays had been called for, it was necessary that he should give a reason why he should vote differently on that petition from the one presented yesterday, which he was told was of the same description, but he had not heard it, being out of his seat when it was read. He thought it was enough to receive petitions from their own citizens—their tables were crowded with memorials from them. Besides, the House should consult their own dignity; language of the nature contained in the petition first read should never meet his approbation.

Mr. DENNIS.—Unless the House were disposed to constitute itself into an organ, through the medium of which every factious, discontented alien might, in the most diffusive manner, propagate his lectures on republicanism, and his slanders relative to the administration of our Government, he presumed the House would not refer the petition. He had given the petition a very cursory reading, and from that he found that the petitioners seemed to have it in view, rather to recommend themselves to their supposed advocates here, for other purposes, than with a view to obtain the apparent object of the memorial. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) had attempted to vindicate the petition, because he says the facts stated are all true. He knew not what particular facts the gentleman alluded to, but, Mr. D. said, there is one fact which he had not known, but which is stated by the petitioners to be true, and which he, therefore, should accredit; and that is, that these petitioners are all convicts of the British dominions. They state that, during the existence of the alien law, our Minister at the Court of St. James was requested by Mr. Adams, who was hostile to republicans, to notify the British Ministry that it was not desirable to us to be burdened with their state prisoners; and that, in consequence of this notification, they were not shipped to this country, but were confined for several years in England. This, I suppose, is one of the truths alluded to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and admitting it to be true, he did not perceive how this would give a license to these people to insult us, by giving us lectures on our Constitution, and by reviling the anti-republican tendencies of a past Administration.

Mr. D. said, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had, in his conception, not been very respectful to the House in comparing the language of these persons with observations that have fallen from members on this floor, in regard to the Executive, and he might say he thought he had been very disrespectful. It had been said, it may be proper to decide this petition, and refer the parts of it which were not exceptionable; but he very much doubted whether there was to be found, in the parliamentary annals of any nation, an instance of the kind. In practice, it will be found that this discrimination amounts to nothing, since the committee, to whom it is proposed to refer it, will be obliged to read the obnoxious part as well as the rest of it; for, although stated as an amendment to another object, the principal object seems to have been to vilify the former Administration. But there is no reason for referring the several parts of it; if there be such, we know all the facts on which the petition is founded, and if relief be proper, it ought to be general, and any gentleman may bring the subject before the House by a resolution.

Mr. BACON said, it would be time enough to attend to the situation of those aliens when they came forward in a decent manner. He thought there could be no great difficulty in settling the question; he believed the House were ready to give their disapprobation to the memorial.

Mr. SMILIE said, he did not know what the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) meant by convicts. The abuse they had received from the former Administration was, in his opinion, sufficient to show that it had been hostile to the principles of republicanism.

Mr. CLAIBORNE was sorry that he had called for the reading of the petition; had he believed that its contents were such as he now discovered them to be, he should not have desired it. He should vote against a reference.

The question was taken on the reference to a committee, and lost—yeas 23, nays 61, as follows:

YEAS—John Archer, Robert Brown, Samuel J. Cabell, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, John Dawson, Andrew Gregg, John A. INDIAN AFFAIRS, &c.

Mr. DAWSON observed that some time since the committee to whom our Indian affairs had been referred, had reported certain resolutions, which it was important to take up, as the arrangements necessary to be made, in case they should be agreed to, would require some time. He, therefore, called for the order of the day on them.

Mr. BACON hoped the gentleman from Virginia would suspend his call, till his (Mr. B's) resolutions respecting the retrocession of the District of Columbia should be disposed of by a reference to a committee, which he proposed to make, and which could only occupy a few minutes.

Mr. NICHOLSON wished these resolutions to be taken up at once, and that the House would immediately, by rejecting them, signify their determination not to recede the District. He was himself decidedly opposed to a retrocession; and he believed a great majority of the House was opposed to it. He hoped, therefore, the House would take up the resolutions and reject them.

Mr. DAWSON withdrew his motion; when the motion of Mr. BACON was before the House.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BAYARD said he would make a motion which would supersede that before the House. He would move that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the proposition of amendment to the Constitution that related to the mode of electing a President and Vice President, of which motion he had given notice yesterday. The proposition of amendment had laid on the table since the third of January, and there was not probably a member of the House that was not prepared to vote upon it. He hoped, therefore, it would be taken up at this time, and not postponed till the end of the session. He recollected the hurry and confusion of the end of the last session, when a resolution was acted upon; and he feared the same effect would follow this session from a postponement. It could not be the wish of any gentleman to let this resolution sleep till certain members had left their seats. It was a great question, as every question was that involved an amendment of the Constitution. He hoped, therefore, that his urgently calling for the taking up of this resolution would not be considered as indicative of a disposition improperly to press the subject on the House, but of a desire to have the fairest decision which could be made, when the House was full.

Mr. S. SMITH said he had early in the day risen to call for the order of the day on the report respecting discriminating and countervailing duties. If the motion of the gentleman from Delaware did not succeed, he hoped the House would recollect that his motion was made before that of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BAYARD said there was no subject before the House less pressing than that which related to the repeal of the discriminating duties. Whatever our proceedings may be, they can be attended with no effect this session. The power given to the King of England by the British Parliament ceased on the fourth of March, and any power we may give to the Executive can have no effect before that time. He hoped, therefore, that subject would not now be taken up. We are every day getting important information respecting it from our merchants, who were the most intelligent and enlightened part of the community, and the best acquainted with the operation of whatever respected their interests. From them we shall receive, what we most want, practical information. However apparently correct theories formed by gentlemen on this floor may be, they may be falsified by facts. He, therefore, thought that this point should remain undecided upon until the latest period of the session, that full and correct information might be obtained. Mr. B. concluded by requiring the yeas and nays.

Mr. GREGG said there was a great deal of business before committees and the House respecting the Territory of Columbia. There appeared to be a disposition to withhold an attention to this business until a decision should be made on the resolutions for a retrocession. It was therefore of immediate necessity to decide this question, that if the resolutions shall be rejected, the business respecting the territory may be attended to.

Mr. NICHOLSON said he was happy to see the anxiety of the gentleman from Delaware on the amendment to the Constitution, as he flattered himself when the subject should come before the House, they would have his assistance to carry it into effect. But he was opposed to taking up that subject at this time. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GREGG) had assigned substantial reasons for immediately taking up the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON.) There was a great mass of business before the House respecting the territory, on which they must act if the District was not receded, and for which there would be no necessity if the territory was receded. This, therefore, was a pressing subject. As to the amendment, though important, it was not pressing; for if it was passed at any time before the close of the session it would be in time for the State Legislatures to act upon at their meetings in the Fall. If gentlemen will leave their seats and neglect the public business, is that a reason for hurrying us, and putting us out of the regular course of procedure? The fault is their own, not ours.

Mr. HUGER thought this a subject of the first importance. It proposed to alter the Constitution of the United States on an important point. This was of much greater importance than the cession of a small district of territory. It appeared to him most extraordinary that so much pains were taken to postpone the consideration of it to a late period of the session. This had been done the last session. It was in vain to say members ought to keep their seats. It was well known that private pursuits would take them away. He trusted, therefore, that at the present time, while the House was full, a decision would be made.

Mr. SMILIE thought, if gentlemen would suffer the question to be taken without unnecessarily consuming the time of the House, they would progress in a much more orderly manner with the public business.

Mr. BACON said there was no doubt about the importance of the proposed amendment of the Constitution. But did it necessarily follow that it was proper to take up that subject to-day? On the contrary, he thought it most proper to take first into consideration the propositions respecting Columbia, for the reasons assigned by several gentlemen.

Mr. GRISWOLD hoped the House would adhere to their own rules. A reference to a Committee of the Whole on the state of Union was, according to these rules, the order for every day. Certainly whatever relates to an amendment of the Constitution is important. It is agreed on all hands that this amendment is of great importance. It was not absolutely necessary that this subject, or that which related to the District of Columbia, should be acted upon to-day. Neither of the objects were so pressing. But where they were equally pressing, was it not proper to take up that first which was acknowledgedly of the greatest importance? He admitted that it was the duty of gentlemen to remain in their seats; but he did not know what reason the House had to find fault with their absence, as they had by formal vote sanctioned it.

H. OF R.

Amendment to the Constitution.

Gentlemen will admit that a question of such importance as went to change the national compact under which they held their seats ought not to be decided upon but by the votes of every person entitled to vote upon it. Shall we then delay its decision until a third of the members are gone? A decision under such circumstances would not be doing justice to the spirit of the Constitution, which required the concurrence of two thirds of the members of both Houses.

Mr. DAVIS could not account for the change produced in the minds of some gentlemen on this subject. Last session, when this subject was before Congress, the gentleman from Delaware was opposed to deciding upon it; to-day he is earnestly for deciding upon it. He is from time to time calling it up, contrary to the established usage of the House, which, when a gentleman lays a motion on the table, permits it as a matter of compliment to lie until he calls it up. Now the gentleman from Delaware unceasingly calls for it. Last session, when taken up, he voted against it. The gentleman from Connecticut, also, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) while he charges us with inconsistency, exposes his own. Mr. D. declared he could only account for this strange conduct on the part of gentlemen by their knowledge, that, owing to the particular state of the Senate, as to the attendance of members, though the proposed amendment might be carried here, it would at present fail there.

Mr. BAYARD said, if the gentleman from Kentucky had attended to what he had said, he would not have been at a loss to account for his conduct. He was glad to find consistency recommended from that quarter, as he might hope in future to find a reformation. But as the remarks of the gentleman applied to him, (Mr. B.,) he should show by his vote his consistency. He voted then against the amendment, and should do so again. What then? Did that betray any inconsistency? Did his now calling up the subject mark any inconsistency? He had avowed his motive. The numbers of the House were wasting every day, and they may soon vary in such a degree as to affect the result, and make it different from that which would appear were the vote now taken. Last session such an effect was produced by delaying the decision until the close of the session. To avoid a similar effect was the subject of his call. His desire was that the decision should be fairly made by the whole votes in the House.

The gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) had said the House ought not to be hurried. He did not know what to understand by this expression. The resolution had laid on the table for more than one month. Notice had been given a week ago by the honorable mover that it would be called up; and yesterday it had been voted down by the majority. Notice had been then given that it would be called up to-day; and yet the gentleman talks of hurry. When is this hurry to cease? If it shall be delayed until the last day of the session, the same ground of objection will exist. Why not now decide it? When it was called up yesterday, gentlemen professed their solicitude to take up another subject, and said this question might be taken up to-day. Now it is called, and the old song is sung. If gentlemen are serious in their wish to frugalize time, they will go into a Committee of the Whole on this subject immediately, and decide it; and no longer waste time in discussing it. Mr. B. did not believe the discussion of it could occupy more than half an hour. As it had last session been fully discussed, it would be a work of supererogation to go over the same ground again.

Mr. S. SMITH observed that this was rather a novel attempt. According to the established usage of the House, when a gentleman lays a resolution on the table, he takes his own time to call it up. He understood it was the intention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had offered the resolution, (Mr. LEIB,) to notify the House that he would at a certain day call it up. And now the gentleman from Delaware takes it out of his hands, and is pressing for an instantaneous decision. And for what? Not for our convenience—not for the convenience of a majority of this House who are friendly to the proposition—but for his own convenience, and that of his friends who are hostile to it. This was a novel lesson to give a majority. No sir, we are to study our own convenience; and to adopt that course which we deem best, for the transaction of the public business. If certain gentlemen, from private reasons, leave their seats, they are not to expect that business will be delayed or precipitated on their account. The arguments that have been urged are against the gentleman. This business is before the House, does not require the passage of a law, and may be decided upon at any moment; whereas the resolutions respecting the retrocession of the District of Columbia require first to be acted upon, to enable the House to determine what business in relation to this Territory it will be necessary to take up.

Messrs. LOWNDES and T. MORRIS spoke in favor of going into a Committee of the Whole on the amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. LEIB said he was yesterday in favor of taking up the proposition of amendment. As, however, he was satisfied that the other business was of a more pressing nature, he was willing that it should give place to that.

Mr. BAYARD.—We are told by the gentleman from Maryland that it is the duty of the majority to study their own convenience. He is for studying his own convenience. What he means by their convenience, or his convenience, I am at a loss to understand. I suppose, however, he means that their convenience will consist in delaying this decision, until the members on one side of the House may dwindle down so low that a majority of two-thirds may remain on the other side; so that a fair expression of the will of the whole House shall not prevail. For this declaration, I feel obliged to the gentleman. He has often before made many a precious confession, and this was one to be added to their number. He told us the other day that he and his friends had taken great pains to get the power of the country into their hands. I suppose the same pains are now to be taken, by creating a majority by artificial means.

I only rose, however, to say one word, as to this being considered as the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Kentucky has told us that it is an affair of compliment to suffer a resolution offered by a particular member to rest until called up by him. I confess, that however disposed I may be in personal intercourse to observe such rules, I am not here disposed to observe compliment at the expense of duty. In this case there was a peculiar reason for the call. The gentleman who originally offered the resolution, gave notice of his intention to call it up on a fixed day. That day has gone over without any call. We see the House daily wasting in numbers. We wish a fair decision; one made by the whole votes of all the members. Gentlemen, therefore, cannot complain of our doing what they recommend; that is, to study our own convenience. They seldom study ours, and if we did not study our own, it is probable that it would be but little regarded. But what am I to understand when the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) talks of his majority? Does he mean that the gentlemen on my left [the greater number of the Republican members sit on that side,] will vote for it barely because he means to vote for it? I must believe those gentlemen in voting on this question will exercise the independent powers of their own minds, will follow the dictates of their own judgments, and be actuated by patriotism as honorable, and motives as pure as those of the gentleman himself.

MR. S. SMITH.—However the gentleman from Delaware may not have understood our convenience, he has shown that he understands his own, by putting words in my mouth which I never uttered. I never said the majority of this House was my majority. The reason why I said a majority was in favor of the amendment, appears from the journals of the last session, on which the fact appears by the votes of two-thirds of the members in favor of it. It would ill become me to talk of any majority. It would be presumption in me to hold any such language. Gentlemen with whom I generally act, know me better, and themselves. I did, however, say, that it suited the convenience of this House to make the business they had to transact progress in their own way, and not according to the convenience of the gentleman from Delaware. I considered that a sufficient explanation; and if these remarks were those for which the gentleman obtained leave to speak a third time, he might have saved himself the trouble. I am not averse to taking up this subject at the proper time; but I must object to forcing it into the place of other business that, according to the usual course of proceeding, ought to take precedence.

The question was then taken on Mr. GRISWOLD's motion, by yeas and nays, and lost—yeas 37, nays 61, as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the following resolutions, offered by Mr. BACON:

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to recede to the State of Virginia the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia, which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Virginia, by an act passed the third day of December in the year 1789, entitled, 'An act for the cession of ten miles square, or any lesser quantity of territory, within this State, to the United States in Congress assembled, for the permanent seat of the General Government.' Provided, the said State of Virginia shall consent and agree thereto.

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to recede to the State of Maryland the jurisdiction of that part of Columbia which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Maryland, by an act passed the 19th day of December, in the year 1791, entitled 'An act concerning the Territory of Columbia and the City of Washington.' Provided, The said State of Maryland shall consent and agree thereto."

The first resolution being read,

MR. SMILIE said it was not his wish to take up the time of the House, but barely to assign, in a few words, his reasons for the vote he should give. In the last Congress he had voted against the assumption, and he had heard no reasons since to change his opinion on the propriety of that vote. He should, therefore, vote now for a retrocession. He never could understand the reason for giving Congress an exclusive jurisdiction over ten miles square. He believed there was but one reason: It had been thought good policy to introduce this article into the Constitution to facilitate its adoption, as it was known that all parts of the Union were anxious to have the seat of Government. It did not appear to him, in any proper point of view, necessary that Congress should possess such exclusive jurisdiction. There was no doubt that, let Congress sit where they would, they would always have sufficient power to protect themselves. Unfortunately, however, there was on this subject an association of ideas in the minds of many persons, not in the least connected, which was, that the residence of Congress in this place, and their possessing exclusive jurisdiction, was the same thing. If the exercise of exclusive jurisdiction could have any effect on his mind, as to the other point, it would be directly opposite, as he would much rather sit here without than with exclusive jurisdiction, as we cannot possess this authority without depriving the citizens of rights which were the most dear to them. When he looked around him, and saw no man, unless a stranger, who was not a political slave, he felt the most painful sensations. Under our exercise of exclusive jurisdiction the citizens here are deprived of all political rights, nor can we confer them. If Congress can derive no solid benefit from the exercise of this power, why keep the people in this degraded situation? It is true, this place may be settled by foreigners; but can we suppose that any native citizen, who values his political rights, will come here? For the honor of the country, he must suppose there would be none. Why not then restore the people to their former condition? Mr. S. concluded by declaring that the act of retrocession would have no effect upon his mind as to staying here.

Mr. BACON said he would state, in a few words, the reasons that influenced him in submitting these resolutions. In the first place, he knew of no advantage which the United States derived from retaining the exclusive jurisdiction of this District. Therefore, if the States to which it originally belonged were disposed to take it back, there could be no objection derived from this consideration. In the second place, it appeared, from their short experience, that the exercise of exclusive legislation would take up a great deal of time, and produce a great expense to the nation; and it was probable that, in the course of events, the trouble and expense would increase with the increasing number of the inhabitants. Should justice be done to the exercise of this power, it was likely that as much time would be spent in legislating for this District as for the whole United States. It was certain that very considerable time would be consumed. They would likewise be subjected to other expenses than those attendant on legislation. In the next place, the Government would be very diverse from that in the other parts of the Union. He would rather see the Government in the United States uniform. Here the citizens would be governed by laws, in the making of which they have no voice—by laws not made with their own consent, but by the United States for them—by men who have not the interest in the laws made that legislators ought always to possess—by men also not acquainted with the minute and local interests of the place, coming, as they did, from distances of 500 to 1,000 miles. From these considerations, he inferred their incompetency to legislate for this District, whatever their disposition might be. These were the principal reasons that influenced his mind. They might however, perhaps, be easily obviated by the reasons of other gentlemen, which he would be glad to hear.

Mr. HUGER was opposed to the resolutions, first, because he was not inclined hastily to make alterations in the great national compact that held us together. It appeared to him that, though they might not always understand the reasons on which a part of it was founded, yet it was prudent not to change it until experience had clearly proved its inconvenience. It must be obvious that it was easier to perceive its present inconvenience than to foresee the effects that may ensue from a change. The Constitution contemplates the exercise by Congress of exclusive legislation over ten miles square. It must impress itself upon the mind of every gentleman that the wise men who framed the Constitution deemed it proper. Congress also had thought it proper, as well as two of the most respectable States in the Union—the one by receiving and the other by granting the territory. All these considerations impressed his mind with a disinclination hastily to alter the course that had been pursued.

Another reason which weighed with him was that, though they had been here three winters, they had no reason to believe that a majority or any considerable portion of the people wished to be receded.

Great force has been attached to an agreement derived from the present situation of the people of the Territory—from their deprivation of rights. He felt for them. But, because they are now disfranchised of their rights, it does not follow that they are always to remain so. He hoped they would not recede them on this account. He looked forward to the period when the inhabitants, from their numbers and riches, would be entitled to a representation on this floor. And, with respect to their local concerns, when they grow more numerous and wealthy, there would be no difficulty in giving them a Territorial Legislature.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) founded one of his arguments on the idea that the Government of the United States could derive no advantage from the ten miles square. While, however, he (Mr. H.) felt a great respect for the States, he must think that the Government of the United States should be placed where it might find its own convenience. Though under the States it might in most cases proceed without * material inconvenience, yet he could suppose some circumstances that might expose the Government to great inconvenience. This was one reason on which the article of the Constitution was grounded. Such an occurrence had taken place at Philadelphia, where Congress had been surrounded by the soldiery, and had not been able to get aid to relieve them.

Another argument against the retrocession was his belief that it would affect property injuriously. Citizens in various parts of the Union, and foreigners, had made purchases in consequence of the cession. Without pretending to say that property would be less safe under State Governments, he could conceive that foreigners might consider it more safe under the protection of the National Government.

It is said that much time is taken up, and great expense incurred, in attending to the affairs of the Territory. When a day or two is taken up in any discussion, we are always told of the expense. But, to prove that the expense would be diminished if we had not these objects to attend to, it was necessary to show that the session would be shortened. He believed if there was not one-third of the usual business before Congress, the session would not be terminated before the 3d of March. Besides, much of the inconvenience we now experience arises from the novelty of the business. A sufficient attention has not been yet paid to the organization of the Territory, which, when properly arranged, will remove a great share of our trouble. He had no doubt that, when the Government became acquainted with the wants and the wishes of the people, the government of them by the United States would be rendered as agreeable to them as that of the States.

Gentlemen, in looking at the inconvenience attached to the people of the Territory, do not sufficiently regard the superior convenience they possess. Though the citizens may not possess full political rights, they have a greater influence upon the measures of the Government than any equal number of citizens in any other part of the Union.

Mr. H. concluded by observing that he felt no disposition to go at large into the discussion. He had barely made these remarks to show that the propriety of a retrocession was not so plain a case as might be inferred from the arguments of gentlemen who had preceded him.

Mr. DENNIS regretted that he had been called out of the House when this subject was taken up, as, in the remarks which he considered it his duty to make, he could not avail himself of the ideas suggested by other gentlemen, and as he might repeat what had been perhaps already said. He would undertake, however, to show that the proposed resolutions were objectionable in every point of view that could be taken of them. They presented two aspects. Admitting, in the first place, that they could be carried into effect, so far as to restore the people of the Territory to the situation in which they were placed before the cession, yet it appeared to him a strong objection that all the advantages of exclusive jurisdiction would be thereby lost. He had always thought that part of the Constitution which gave Congress exclusive jurisdiction over a district of ten miles square wise and proper, and that a government whose laws were to pervade the whole United States ought not to be subjected to the whim or caprice of any part of the United States.

It was extraordinary to assert (and the whole system of our legislation went to prove it) that the possessing exclusive jurisdiction should be made the sine qua non of accepting a trifling spot for a light-house or a fortification, and yet, in an affair of so much importance as the present, that jurisdiction should be abandoned. If in the former cases sole jurisdiction was insisted upon, it was infinitely more important to have a control over that district in which the Government itself exercised its powers. But, in the second place, it is evident that these resolutions, if agreed to, cannot have the effect of restoring the people to the situation in which they were placed before the cession. The provision in the Constitution is imperative; and it is impossible by any act of ours to divest ourselves of the ultimate jurisdiction over the Territory. For the Constitution declares "that Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States."

By exclusive legislation, he understood the exclusion to the States of all participation in legislation. He admitted that it was competent to Congress to sanction the acts of Maryland and Virginia; but he believed that no one would contend that Congress could divest themselves of an ultimate control. They might admit the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia to legislate for the Territory, but Congress possessed the power of controlling or modifying their acts. He would wish to know what advantage there could be in giving this legislative agency to those States? If given, no doubt could be entertained of many acts passed by them being disagreeable to the people of the Territory, who would apply to Congress to repeal them. The next Congress, too, would have the power of resuming the jurisdiction, or, more properly speaking, the jurisdiction would still remain in Congress. Under such a qualified cession, he presumed the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland would refuse to act; for, why should they legislate for people not within their limits? The power of legislation might as well be vested in the Legislature of Massachusetts. The truth is, that our jurisdiction would be paramount, and the acts of Maryland and Virginia would go into operation merely by our permission, and Congress might repeal and amend them whenever and howsoever they pleased. We should, therefore, be then relieved from no trouble that we now experience. There would then be as many applications to pass laws as there are now.

In another point of view he was astonished at these propositions, and at the quarter from which they came. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) has told us that his resolutions are bottomed on the broad basis of the rights of man; but he would ask how this could be, when the resolutions went to transfer twenty thousand men, without their consent, to a Government different from that under which they now live? Gentlemen are going to imitate some of the extraordinary scenes that have lately occurred in Europe, and propose to transfer this District with the same facility that in that quarter of the globe they have transferred an Italian dukedom or a German principality.

Mr. D. thought the situation of Congress in relation to the people of this Territory was not sufficiently understood. He knew that it was always troublesome to legislate for any people: he foresaw these inconveniences when they removed to this place. He had thought then, as he thought now, that some legislative government must be provided for the District. In this opinion he had never varied, but had, from successive events, become more confirmed in its accuracy. But, if gentlemen object to vesting the people with the power of government, he thought he could suggest a plan better than that of retrocession, to wit: to vest the President with the power to revise the laws of Maryland and Virginia, and make a report to the next session of Congress. The laws of Maryland and Virginia were generally agreeable to the people, but they experienced many inconveniences from local and peculiar circumstances.

Mr. D. concluded by observing that he had risen without methodising his thoughts; but he conceived the resolutions of so mischievous a tendency, so infractive of the Constitution, and (if adopted) so nugatory, that he conceived it his duty to raise his voice against them.

The Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 9.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting two statements of the importations in American and foreign vessels, commencing the first of October, one thousand eight hundred, and ending on the thirtieth of September, one thousand eight hundred and one, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the twenty-ninth of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EUSTIS moved to postpone for one hour the unfinished business of yesterday, in order to take up a bill to provide an additional armament for the protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States. Carried.

The House accordingly went into a Committee of the Whole on that bill. The Committee reported the bill without amendment. The House concurred in the report, and ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. GREGG moved the order of the day on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of George Mason.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of George Mason. The Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the report of the Committee of Claims, which provides for the allowance of pensions to soldiers of the South Carolina line unprovided for. The House took up the report, concurred, and directed the Committee of Claims to bring in a bill.

Mr. BAYARD offered a resolution for the appointment of three legal characters by the President, to revise the laws of Maryland and Virginia, and form therefrom a uniform system for the District of Columbia; and to report the same to Congress.

Mr. MITCHELL moved the appointment of a joint committee of both Houses to inquire into the state of the public buildings, what repairs are required, and the expense attending the same.

Mr. EUSTIS offered two resolutions—the one for making provision by law for making such alterations in the Capitol, as are required for the future accommodation of Congress; the other appropriating the sum of — dollars.

The above resolutions were ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved that the House should resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order to take up the proposed amendment to the Constitution respecting the election of President and Vice President.

After some conversation, the question was taken on Mr. GRISWOLD's motion by yeas and nays, and lost—yeas 28, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS—James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, John Campbell, Samuel W. Mr. DAWSON moved that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union should be discharged from the consideration of two propositions of amendment to the Constitution, the one prescribing the designation of the persons voted for as President and Vice President, the other prescribing that representatives and electors shall be chosen in districts.

Mr. DAVIS said he would second the motion to relieve gentlemen from the apprehensions entertained of these amendments being taken up at a late period of the session when the House might be thin. And if the motion prevailed, he would move a postponement of the consideration of the amendments till the first Monday of November.

Both motions were carried without a division.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolutions of Mr. BACON to recede to the States of Maryland and Virginia the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAYARD hoped the Committee would not agree to the resolutions. He did not believe that a Constitutional power existed enabling the Government of the United States to recede the Territory. The Territory had been acquired by the direction and under the permission of the Constitution. The Constitution also allows the cession by particular States. When, therefore, gentlemen say Congress has the power to recede, he was at liberty to call upon them to exhibit that part of the Constitution that conferred the power. He had looked over the Constitution with a vigilant eye, and he could see nothing to this effect. Can it be done without power? Do gentlemen recollect that the Government of the United States is federative, and of course possessed of limited powers; and what is not delegated does not exist; and that there is an express provision that powers not expressly given shall not be assumed by implication? It was difficult to point out a non-entity. If gentlemen contend for an entity, they should distinguish it. If Congress have the power to recede this Territory, they have also the power to recede the others, the Indiana and Mississippi Territories. It is an extremely different thing to receive a cession and to recede it after it is received. Congress has the power to do the one, but not the other. How can the retrocession be made? Gentlemen say, by law. That law may be repealed. If receded, what would be the situation of the Territory? It could be no affair of contract. For a contract cannot exist without a consideration. Though, on the cession, there was a consideration, in receding there would be none. Would there be a power in Virginia and Maryland, if receded, to prevent a resumption? Such a measure showed but little respect for the people of the Territory. As far as he knew the sentiments of the people, it was not their wish to be receded. They were willing to live under the protection of Congress. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has called them slaves. They may not thank him for the appellation. If they were slaves, there must be some corollary; and if so, we must be their tyrants. But they are not slaves; they are children, over whom it is not our wish to tyrannise, but whom we would foster and nurture. Are we, in the character of Representatives of the United States, to be considered as their tyrants, because they are not immediately represented here? We ought not to decide this question until the people express their desire to return to the States.

But there is a more serious consideration relative to the people of the Territory. It is proposed to recede the District to Maryland and Virginia. Once take that step, and what obligation was there in Congress to remain here? He felt there was none. The obligation to remain arises, in a great measure, from the cession, and by destroying that, you extinguish the sense of the obligation to stay. This may be the object of gentlemen. A number of the measures lately proposed appeared to have that tendency. One motion had been made to concentrate the public buildings. Violate one stipulation of the Government, or disappoint a reasonable expectation that had been excited by the measures of the Government, and the ruin of hundreds follows. Now, a motion is made to recede. Combine these two operations. Unfix the Capitol, and recede the District, and, believe me, Congress will soon take wings and fly to some other place. It had been truly remarked, on a similar occasion, by those interested, though these things may be sport to you, they are death to us. Not a motion of this kind had been made, or could be made, that did not depreciate the interests of the place, and frustrate the object professed. By such means, our accommodations will be impaired, all enterprise be subdued, and industry languish. He hoped, therefore, that the House, by a decided vote, would reject these resolutions, and put all similar ones to sleep.

Mr. GREGG said he had expected that this question would have been decided by a silent vote. He, for his part, had no intention of having troubled the Committee with any observations of his on the subject, but as other gentlemen had seen proper to enter into a discussion of it, he would beg the indulgence of the Committee while he assigned, as concisely as possible, the reasons that would influence his vote. Having been a member of the Legislature at the time the act was passed for assuming the jurisdiction of the Territory, he foresaw pretty clearly most of the difficulties in which we are now involved by that act, and therefore had given it his opposition in every stage of its passage. A majority of the Legislature, however, at that time, entertained a different opinion, and made the assumption. From that moment he had considered a contract to be fully complete and ratified between the States of Maryland, Virginia, the people of the Territory of Columbia, and the Government of the United States. That contract he considered as of permanent obligation, not to be done away, but by the unanimous consent of all the parties.

Among the specific powers of Congress enumerated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, there is this one, "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by the cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the 'United States.' Now, the States of Maryland and Virginia have made this cession, with the consent and approbation of the people in the ceded Territory, and Congress has accepted the cession, and assumed the jurisdiction. Are they then at liberty, or can they relinquish it without the consent of the other parties? It is presumed they cannot. In his opinion, they were constitutionally and morally bound to proceed in the exercise of that power regularly assumed, either immediately, by themselves, or by the intervention of a Territorial Legislature, chosen, and acting under a special act of Congress for that purpose. To relinquish the jurisdiction at this time, and recede the Territory, would, in his view, exhibit a surprising inconsistency of conduct in the Legislature. It would discover such a versatility, such a disposition to change, as could not fail to unsettle the minds of the people, and shake their confidence in the Government. All the arguments that had been drawn from expense and inconvenience, he thought admitted of an easy answer. A Territorial Legislature would remove every difficulty arising from those sources. It would transact all the business, now crowded on us, respecting the internal concerns of the place. The people of the Territory had heretofore been averse from that measure; and no doubt that aversion had considerable influence in preventing Congress from adopting such a provision. He believed, however, that the people were fast changing their opinions on that subject; they were beginning to see the necessity of a Legislature of their own and he expected that the period was not very remote when there would be a universal concurrence of sentiment in favor of it. He said he considered, as highly improper, every proposition which might be considered as pointing, either directly or indirectly, at a removal of the seat of Government from this place. The evident, the inevitable tendency of such motions, was to discourage adventurers, to check improvement, and greatly to impede the prosperity of the place. Instead of doing this, he thought Government ought to protect and encourage it as far as encouragement could be given, without resorting to taxes on the other citizens of the United States. He never would agree to let his constituents be taxed one single cent, to be laid out on improvements in the city, farther than what might be necessary to erect, and keep in repair suitable buildings for the accommodation of Government. But he would allow it every advantage, every encouragement, to be derived from an explicit, unequivocal and decided assurance, that it should for ever remain the seat of the Government of the United States. With this view of the subject, and under these impressions, he should give his decided negative to the propositions now on the table, and to all others of a similar nature and tendency.

Mr. SMILE could not agree either with the gentleman from Delaware or with his colleague (Mr. GREGG) on the Constitutional question. We had a power to accept the cession, or not to accept it; from which necessarily resulted the power of recession. Instead of arguing as the gentleman from Delaware, he would call on him to point out in the Constitution the prohibition. His colleague talked of a moral obligation to keep the Territory. This might exist, if it were proposed to force this Territory on the States without their consent. The gentleman seems to have taken offence at the expression which had fallen from him of slaves. For his part, he had never been accustomed to courtly language, but to the expression of his ideas plainly and openly as he conceived them. He certainly had not used the expression with any intention to treat the people of this Territory with disrespect; but to express his regret at the degraded situation of those who were formerly in possession of the full rights of citizenship. The gentleman seems also offended at the epithet of tyrants applied to us.

Mr. S. would ask the gentleman from Delaware, if ever he knew a Government possessed of unlimited power, who had not abused it. This was the condition of this Government, which he hoped, however, if continued, would be moderate. He had expected that gentlemen opposed to the retrocession would have shown the benefit derived to the United States from retaining the jurisdiction. If there were none, it was useless and dangerous, inasmuch as it could only be done at the expense of the rights of the people. He was surprised yesterday at the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DENNIS,) that this measure would deprive twenty thousand people of their rights. How could this be, when they had no right to be deprived of? You may give them a charter. But of what avail will this be, when Congress may take it away at any moment? They would continue forever to be ultimately governed by a body over whom they had no control. Mr. S. concluded by again observing that he had always thought the assumption wrong; but that he had no idea of connecting that consideration with the removal of the Government. It could have no influence on his mind. He would go further, and say that he had no idea of removing; nor did he believe they could remove.

Mr. BACON said, he was the more confirmed in the propriety of bringing forward his resolutions by the remarks which had been made by gentlemen opposed to them. The question to-day has turned on the Constitutional power of Congress to recede. Gentlemen say that there is no power given to Congress to recede. He would allow that there were no express words in the Constitution; but he considered the general powers given as fully competent, without any such particular expressions. The words in the Constitution are: "The Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district, (not exceeding ten miles square,) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful

'buildings.' Now, he took it that the power of Congress extended equally and alike to all these places accepted in consequence of the cession of particular States, and it was equally absolute upon Congress to retain all, the one as well as the other. He was apprehensive that the argument of gentlemen, if it proved anything, proved too much. He doubted whether gentlemen would contend, that when Congress once accept a piece of ground for an arsenal or a dock yard, they thereby oblige themselves to retain the exclusive jurisdiction forever. The practise of the House this very session disproved it; for they had very lately passed an act giving away the corner of a navy yard. But the words of the Constitution are not imperative; they do not say that Congress shall exercise exclusive jurisdiction over the places thus ceded by the States. What is the situation of the territory at present? The laws of the States from which it was ceded, are still in force in some instances.

It is said to-day that this District was ceded to Congress under a contract. But this contract was not made by the individual citizens, but by the States. If, then, by this contract between Congress and the States, Congress have obtained their jurisdiction by the common consent of the parties, it may be done away; and this is all that is proposed by the resolutions.

Gentlemen have observed that this and every other similar motion have the effect of depreciating property in this place. This Mr. B. doubted very much. If he were a citizen, he would consider his property more valuable under the jurisdiction of laws, in the formation of which he participated, than when he had no participation. He thought, therefore, that the adoption of his resolutions would rather appreciate property, by placing those who held it on the same broad basis as to the possession of political rights with the other citizens of the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GREGG) conceives that the decision of this question will affect the permanent seat of Government. But it could have no such effect. The continuance of this place as the seat of Government was connected with a contract made with individuals, which was binding on the Government to remain. The Government had received from the individuals a valuable consideration, and had, in return, given the individuals the consideration attached to their remaining here, and the Government could not remove without a violation of this contract. This was his idea. The Government could not remove without the consent of these individuals.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. DENNIS) has observed that all the advantages contemplated by Congress from an exclusive jurisdiction, would be frustrated by the adoption of these resolutions. But he has not named a single one of these contemplated advantages. Though called upon to name them, he had not named one. He must, therefore, conclude that no one had occurred to him; and, until they were named, he must doubt whether the United States derived any benefit from the exclusive jurisdiction.

The same gentleman has expressed his astonishment that these resolutions should come from this quarter of the House. He has intimated that he (Mr. BACON) predicated his ideas on the broad basis of the rights of man. Mr. B. believed that this would be the effect of his resolutions. One view he had was to re-vest the citizens of this District with the rights of suffrage, and how they would be made slaves by a restoration to the rights of suffrage, and the common rights of their fellow-citizens, he could not conceive.

Mr. B. terminated his remarks by observing, that as he had heard of no advantages derived to the United States from retaining exclusive jurisdiction, as there was nothing in the Constitution repugnant to a retrocession, as it was clearly authorized, with the consent of the contracting parties, as it would not in the least affect the question of removal, as the citizens of the Territory would be benefited by it, and as a great expense of time and treasure would be saved, he considered it expedient to make the retrocession, provided it received the consent of the contracting parties.

Mr. RANDOLPH said that, whatever reasons might be advanced on the ground of expediency against the adoption of the resolutions, he wished to say a few words on the Constitutional objections which had been offered to them. The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. BAYARD) told us, on a very late occasion, that the power to create involved the power to destroy; and although I may not be willing to adopt this maxim in all the latitude in which it was urged by that gentleman, I have no hesitation in averring my belief that Congress possess the right, with the assent of these States, respectively, to cede the several portions of this territory to Maryland and Virginia. Nor, in my opinion, does this doctrine militate against that construction of the Constitution, which regards that instrument in the light of a limited grant of power. In this construction I heartily concur with the gentleman from Delaware, or rather, if he will permit me to say so, I am glad to find he agrees with me, as I have retained my opinion, whilst he seems to have changed his. I readily admit that Congress possesses no power but that which is devolved on them by the Constitution, explicitly, or which is evidently included in, or deducible from its plain provisions. The Constitution no where gives Congress the express power of repealing laws; but the repeal of laws is essentially connected with the power of passing them, as in this case, the right to recede is involved in the right to accept the cession. The parties to this compact are the United States, of the one part, and the States of Maryland and Virginia, of the other. We speak the voice of the United States, and, among others, of Maryland and Virginia, in their confederate capacity. The Legislatures of those States answer for them in their individual capacity. If all these parties are agreed to revoke their act, I wish to know who is to dissent to it, or what obstacle can prevent its being rescinded?

Mr. R. said, that he was of the number of those who voted against assuming the jurisdiction of this territory. He did it from a predilection for those principles in which the American Revolution originated. From the firm belief that men ought not to be bound by laws in whose formation they had no influence. It was the violation of that principle, and not the extent to which it was carried, which laid the foundation of our independence. For, let it be remembered that the demand of Great Britain went only to a peppercorn; but that we disdained the admission of so odious a doctrine, and commenced a determined and successful resistance. But it is denied that this territory is in a state of slavery, because, says the gentleman, it implies that we are tyrants. The term slavery, sir, excites in the mind of man an odious idea. There are, however, various species of this wretched condition. Domestic slavery, of all others, the most oppressive; and political slavery, which has been well defined, to be that state in which any community is divested of the power of self-government, and regulated by laws to which its assent is not required, and may not be given. Nor have I ever before understood that slavery, particularly of the last description, necessarily implied tyranny, although it too frequently is productive of it. But, so far from being slaves, the people within this territory are, it seems, our children, who are to experience every indulgence at our hands. Sir, the form of government, such as has been described, however mild and beneficent it may be in its administration, places those subjected to it in a state of political slavery, and they are as completely divested of self-control as the infant who is dandled on the knee of its parent. As to the existence, then, of this species of slavery, it mattered not whether the people within the limits of this District were regarded as the favorite son, and feasted on the fatted calf, or were exposed to the cruel rigor of a stepmother.

An idea had been held out from a very respectable quarter that this District might, in time, become a State. As to Congress, what difference will they find between being under the jurisdiction of the State of Columbia, or the State of Maryland. But, if this objection were removed, it is impossible that this territory can become a State. The other States can never be brought to consent that two Senators and, at least, three electors of President, shall be chosen out of this small spot, and by a handful of men.

The Constitution seems to have intended, by its provision on this subject, to guard the General Government against the undue influence of any particular States wherein it might sit. An insurrection in Philadelphia is mentioned by some gentleman as having given rise to this clause in the Constitution. The Constitution, no doubt, had a wise end in view, but it has failed in the means of attaining it. No man has a higher respect than myself for the talents of the framers of that instrument. But let it be remembered, that they were making a great experiment, and to have failed in but a single object, is the highest proof of their wisdom. The physical force of this small District would prove but a poor defence against the aggression of large and powerful States. Happily, our security is more amply provided for; it results from the command which has been given us over the sword and the purse of the Union. Our protection is not in a mathematical line—which would oppose but a feeble resistance to an invading foe. But let gentlemen ask themselves, why the inhabitants of this District should be less formidable if disposed to insurrection, because under our own jurisdiction? Look at Paris! was the insurrection of the fourteenth of July, which humbled into the dust the ancient monarchy of France, the effect of a want of jurisdiction; of a want of power in the Government over the lives and fortunes of the people? Did the city afford the Government a defence? No, it was in insurrection. Did the military send its aid? On the contrary, it joined the insurgents. What was the fact at Philadelphia? That Congress was insulted by its own troops. Would the civil jurisdiction of the town have repelled the bayonet? No, it was not in parchment to afford this defence. It has left us an awful lesson against standing armies; and if we shall ever be so infatuated as to multiply armies about us, we may rely in vain on the lines of circumvallation which the limits of our exclusive jurisdiction form. The Constitution, therefore, has failed in its endeavor to give to Congress any other security than that which public opinion and the command of the national resources afford.

But, whilst I have no doubt on the subject of our Constitutional right, I am opposed to the resolution on the ground of expediency. It appears to have disseminated a great alarm among the people of our immediate neighborhood. At a proper time, when great unanimity can be obtained, it may be carried into effect. If now passed, it is irrevocable; and I have no indisposition to give the question the most mature deliberation, and to give it a fair operation on the public mind. I could wish, indeed, to see the people within this District restored to their rights. Men in such a situation are, as it had been wisely and eloquently said, fit instruments to enslave their fellow-men. This species of Government is an experiment how far freemen can be reconciled to live without rights; an experiment dangerous to the liberties of these States. But, inasmuch as it has been already made, inasmuch as I was not accessory to it, and as, at some future time, its deleterious effects may be arrested, I am disposed to vote against the resolutions. I view them as a fatal present to this House, although I respect the motives in which I believe them to have originated; as tending to disunite those who ought ever to act in concert; and I have no hesitation on a question of expediency to declare my disposition to concede something to the wishes and fears of those around me. In their present shape, at least, I shall therefore vote against the resolutions.

Mr. EUSTIS was opposed to the resolutions, for the reasons which had been stated, and for other reasons not mentioned, though they might have occurred to the minds of gentlemen. He thought it right to express a difference of opinion with the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH.) on an important question, the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress to the ten miles square. He was not prepared to pronounce the provision of the Constitution on this subject deficient or unwise. It rather appeared to him to be founded in the nature of the Government. A Government on parchment, and without force, was no Government at all. It had been stated this provision grew out of a transaction at Philadelphia, and asked what dependence was to be placed on a military force when that force was itself the aggressor? But that transaction suggested a different result. Had the militia been well equipped and ready for service, and under the immediate control of Congress, would the military force have been suffered to overawe them? This very case furnished an argument for investing Congress with the complete command of the militia force of the territory, to screen them from insult, and to protect them from the application of force that might destroy deliberation. They had already taken a course calculated to prove the soundness of this mode of protection. Their laws had recognised the militia of the territory; and some measures had been taken to organize them. The militia was the physical force Congress must rely on. Suppose that militia were under the command of Maryland, and Congress was about to pass a law obnoxious to that State. Suppose the militia of Maryland to be mutinous, and to surround these walls. Must you resort to Maryland for protection, and wait on her measures? No; the situation of the territory and your immediate power over the militia must furnish you with the means of protection. He therefore thought it one of the best provisions of the Constitution, to submit the physical force near the Government to its direction. The same reasons that give a command over the militia to the States apply to the Federal Government more strongly, and dictate the propriety of the measure by a more imperious necessity. What has happened may happen again. Congress may chance to pass laws obnoxious to the States, or the territory. He would ask if, to-day, they were about to pass such an obnoxious law, and there was no organized militia, where would be their protection? He hoped the Government would give support to the system for organizing the militia of the District, so that they may be an efficient and respectable protection. The principle on which the militia was founded, was, as far as practicable, a sound one; it was a democratic principle, which put arms into the hands of every citizen, and placed him under the command of the Federal Government.

He acknowledged the difficulties of legislating for the territory. But it was a duty which they could not forego, until the government of the people was provided for in some other way; and that, he thought, should be by an internal Legislature. As to the retrocession of the territory, it was impolitic, in point of time. He hoped that Congress would, before they rose, by some act, show that they were impressed with an obligation to make this the permanent seat of Government. After this question was disposed of, he would lay some such resolution on the table.

Mr. THATCHER said, he was not prepared to go fully into the subject, but he wished to add a few ideas to those which had been already expressed. He considered these resolutions as having a tendency to distract and obstruct the operations of business in the territory. Congress had experienced considerable inconveniences in this place; but they had been calculated upon when the Government was removed; and he believed, if similar questions had not been so frequently agitated, the accommodations of Congress would, before this time, have been much better. He hoped this would be the last time such resolutions would be offered. His colleague (Mr. BACON) had suggested the expense and trouble of legislating for the District. As to the expense, he did not see any; and as to the trouble, the business was not managed in the best way. He understood that it was contemplated to give the citizens a local Legislature to manage their own concerns.

But gentlemen say, the people of the territory are now deprived of their rights. But this remark was extraordinary from a gentleman who had offered a resolution for transferring them, like so many Polish or Russian surfs, without their consent.

Mr. T. went at some length into the discussion, and coincided in opinion with the gentlemen who had preceded him in their opposition to the resolutions; and concluded, with saying, that he was clearly of opinion, that Congress ought not to retrocede the territory. He felt as great personal inconvenience, as well as his constituents, from the distance of their residence, as any member on the floor, or his constituents could feel. But he pledged himself and his constituents, that, however great these inconveniences, they would submit to them, in order that they might have a common Capital, and afford security to the Government.

Mr. CLAIBORNE spoke in favor of the said resolutions.

Mr. SOUTHARD rose only to make one observation, which had been touched on but lightly in the course of the debate. It appeared to him that when Congress assumed the exclusive jurisdiction of the ten miles square, they had, in the first instance, entered into a contract with the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland. He had no doubt that, if the contract had ended here, they might, with their consent, make a retrocession. The second step, however, taken, was a contract between the agents of Government and the proprietors, in order to obtain the soil. This contract appeared to him to be solemn and binding. In entering into the contract, the proprietors gave the General Government sites for the public buildings, and half the residue of the land within the city plot. He conceived that this was a contract founded on express stipulations that Congress should exercise exclusive jurisdiction. The proprietors had no idea, at the time they made the contract, that their property would be retroceded; and the Government had since received more than one million's worth of real property which they now enjoyed. He would ask, whether a retrocession, under such circumstances, would not have a retrospective effect, and impair those obligations which the United States were bound to observe? For this reason, he thought a retrocession improper, as it would be a violation of contract with the people of the territory. It appeared to him that, while they were satisfied, the General Government ought to be satisfied.

H. OF R.

District of Columbia.

Various inconveniences had been stated, to which the Government was exposed; and the people of the territory had been represented as in a state of slavery. But he looked forward to the time, as not distant, when they would have the right of governing themselves through a territorial legislature; in which event there would be no time lost to the councils of the nation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BACON) has compared the proposed transfer to that of a little piece of soil for a turnpike road. But the cases were not parallel; as, in the last instance, there were no individuals to be transferred.

Mr. S. had but one more observation to make. Such resolutions tended to destroy the confidence of the people in the Government. When their proceedings fluctuated and became unstable, the Government became unhinged, and the liberties of the nation ceased to be secure. From the tendency of these resolutions he did expect that, before this time, another resolution would have been brought forward, to remove the Government. But he hoped these resolutions would be rejected by so decided a majority, as to prevent the proposition of any similar ones.

Mr. VARNUM called for the reading of the document alluded to, as he had never seen it.

Mr. SOUTHARD said, he did not know that there was any such official document; but he had seen such a statement, of the authenticity of which he entertained no doubt; and he presumed the gentleman was as well possessed of the facts as himself.

Mr. VARNUM doubted the reality of the observation of the gentleman from New Jersey. He suspected there was no such contract in existence. It was not the interest of the Government of the United States to do anything that would injure this District. He therefore supposed that every gentleman who voted on this occasion, would act for the interest of his country. If he thought it possible for Congress to legislate for the territory, he should have no objection to retaining the jurisdiction. But, when he considered that Congress were appointed to legislate on great objects, and not on minute local concerns, he did not think them competent to legislate for the persons situated in the Territory of Columbia. He did not know whether, if the jurisdiction was retained, it would not be proper to indulge the citizens with a territorial legislature. But to this, the people themselves object. Virginia objects to a union with Maryland. There were, manifestly, hostile interests which could not easily be united. And if there shall be a territorial legislature, still Congress has a right over their acts. Whether this was the fit time to retrocede the territory he did not know; but he believed the time would come when the citizens of the territory will be in favor of it.

It appeared to him that the ideas of his colleague (Mr. EUSTIS) respecting the militia, ought to be repelled. He has said that, unprotected by physical force, Maryland or Virginia may bring a force against the Government, and overawe it. Every man, however, knows that the whole militia of the United States are under the control of the United States, and the President has now as full a command over the militia of Maryland or Virginia, as over the militia of Columbia. There was no difference between them, unless the militia of Columbia were to be used by the Executive in cases where there was neither invasion nor insurrection. How far they would be a proper instrument to carry particular plans of the Executive into effect, gentlemen must determine for themselves.

Mr. V. did not know how true it was, that the United States had received one, two, or three millions of dollars. But if it were so, it was so applied as not to render any use to the Government. It was certain there were great piles of buildings erected; but every gentleman who looked through them will be of opinion that they would be more valuable if the materials of which they were composed were thrown down, than to remain as they now do. It was true that these buildings were, in great part, erected with money derived from the sale of lots; but it was also true that large sums had been granted from the Treasury.

Look at the situation of the territory—there were three incorporate bodies. But what was the situation of the other parts of the territory? Are they under any government at all? Do we not see, too, that the citizens of the incorporations are directly opposed to each other, from their peculiar situation. From these inconveniences, Mr. V. said, he wished to relieve them; and he perceived no way so effectual as by a retrocession. He had no doubt of the Constitutional power of Congress. But still, as the people are not willing to enjoy the benefits, in his opinion, to be derived from a retrocession, he was willing to wait until they were prepared for it.

Messrs. BAYARD and RANDOLPH spoke a second time against the resolution.

Mr. SMILE stated the circumstances of the case at Philadelphia, which had been so often alluded to by gentlemen. At the close of the late war there had been a mutiny among the troops, who had surrounded Congress. Not a drop of blood had, however, been spilt. This was the mighty incident of which so liberal a use had been made. He would ask whether, in countries over which the Government had complete jurisdiction, worse things had not happened? He would ask, whether this menace of Congress were to be compared with the mob of Lord Gordon in a country over which the Government had an entire jurisdiction?

The question was then taken on the first resolution, for receding to Virginia the territory originally attached to that State, and lost—ayes 22.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

District of Columbia.

H. OF R.

When the question was taken on the second resolution, and lost, without a division.

The Committee rose, and reported their disagreement to the resolutions.

The House immediately took up their report.

Mr. NICHOLSON called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLAIBORNE spoke in favor of the resolutions.

It was proposed to take the question upon both resolutions together.

Mr. DAWSON moved to divide the question. He said he should vote for the first resolution that retroceded to Virginia that portion of territory originally attached to her; and for the second, with the exception of the City of Washington, which, he thought, ought to be reserved.

Mr. ELMENDORF observed, that of the Constitutional power of Congress to retrocede the territory, he had entertained no doubt. He therefore viewed the present question as a question of expediency; and, in this view, he could not conceive how a single gentleman could conceive it expedient to continue to legislate for a people who were not represented.

Mr. RANDOLPH said, as he believed the House incompetent to legislate for the people of Columbia; as he believed the interests of the several parts of the territory were as hostile as any in the Union, as it was manifest there was an Alexandria, a Georgetown, and a city interest; and even, within the city, a Capitol-hill interest, and a President's-house interest—which were irreconcilable; he should vote for the amendment of his colleague, (Mr. DAWSON.) To attempt to legislate for the District was, in effect, to constitute the chairman of the committee, or, at any rate, the committee itself on the affairs of the territory, the Solon or Lycurgus of the place. It was well known that the indolence of the other members, or their indifference, inseparable from the situation in which they were placed, would prevent Congress from legislating with a full understanding of the objects before them. He, therefore, thought it expedient to retrocede all the territory, excepting the City of Washington. This disposition of the territory would leave entirely untouched the question which arose from the interest of individuals who had made purchases of property under the faith of Congress retaining the jurisdiction. It was probable that, in such event, a corporation might be established in the city that would answer the ends of Government, without two-thirds of the time of the National Legislature being consumed.

Mr. S. SMITH said, he had listened with great attention to the arguments of different gentlemen during the debate. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had told the House, in that debate, that Congress were not competent to legislate for the territory; and yet he is now about to legislate for them in a concern of the utmost importance by giving them away, without their consent, to the States.

Mr. HOLLAND spoke in favor of a retrocession.

Mr. RANDOLPH, in reply to the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) would ask whether the people of the territory were ceded by Maryland and Virginia with their consent?

Mr. BAYARD asked, what the gentleman from Virginia meant by consent? The people had been ceded, with the consent of their Representatives in the Legislatures of Maryland and Virginia. He was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman as it could not relieve Congress from any of their present difficulties. But, to relieve Congress from the trouble they experienced, he had drawn a resolution, which, at a convenient time, he would propose—to authorize the President to appoint three persons, learned in the law, to report to Congress a uniform system of legislation for the territory.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The gentleman from Virginia says, if the people of the territory were ceded without their consent, they may be retroceded without their consent. I do not know that the gentleman can carry his recollection back to the period of the cession. But other gentlemen would recollect that the people of Alexandria were very anxious to be admitted into the ten-miles-square; and they were admitted. If he recollected right, there had been many petitions to that effect from different portions of the District. He believed, therefore, that the people had been ceded with their consent. Before he could vote for the proposed measure, he must be first certain that the people wish to be ceded; when, if the States likewise agreed, he would not withhold his consent to a retrocession with the reservation of the city. But he would object to any such measure, until these things were shown.

Mr. RANDOLPH.—We are told the people of this territory were ceded with their consent; and wherefore? Because the Government, of which they formed a part, agreed to the cession. And what follows? That we, who represent the whole people of the United States, in their confederate capacity, and the States who represent them in their individual capacity, have an equal right to retrocede. With respect to the remark of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) I reply that I consult the interests of the people of the whole United States; and I believe, also, that I consult the true interests of the people residing here.

Mr. BAYARD.—The gentleman from Virginia first told us the people of this territory were slaves. Now, it seems we are their representatives. If so, they are not slaves. The people, in the act of cession, were represented in the only way that they can be represented in this country.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in their disagreement to the first resolution, and carried—yeas 66, nays 26, as follows:

Varnum, Isaac Van Horne, and Robert Williams.

The second and last resolution to which the Committee of the Whole reported their disagreement, being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That it is expedient for Congress to recede to the State of Maryland, the jurisdiction of that part of the Territory of Columbia, which was ceded to the United States by the said State of Maryland, by an act passed the nineteenth day of December, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Columbia and the City of Washington:"—provided the said State of Maryland shall consent and agree thereto:

The question was taken that the House do concur with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the same, and resolved in the affirmative.

THURSDAY, February 10.

An engrossed bill to provide an additional armament for the protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GREEN, the Delegate in this House from the Mississippi Territory of the United States, presented to the House certain resolutions of the General Assembly of the said Territory, and a memorial thereto annexed, from the said Assembly, addressed to the President, Senate, and House of Representatives of the United States, representing the inconveniences to which they have been and are now subjected, in consequence of shutting the port of New Orleans, in virtue of a proclamation of the Spanish Intendant of the said port, without having a place of deposit on the Mississippi river assigned to them in lieu thereof.

The said resolutions and memorial were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A memorial of sundry citizens of the United States, and inhabitants of the city and State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that a monument may be erected to perpetuate the memory of a number of American citizens who perished on board of the British prison ships, or who were slain in defence of their country, during the Revolutionary war; the bones and other remains of whom have been, and still are, daily seen at and near the site of the present navy yard of the United States, in the vicinity of the said city, scarce earthed in the falling banks, or exposed on the naked shores.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to carry into effect several resolutions of Congress for erecting monuments to the memories of Generals Wooster, Harkemer, Davidson, and Scriven," together with the report of a select committee, proposing amendments thereto.

On motion it was

Resolved That the Commissioners, appointed under "An act for the amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Mississippi Territory," be, and they are hereby, authorized to cause to be printed their report respecting the claims of settlers, or other persons, together with such documents as may accompany the same; and that the expense thereof be defrayed out of the contingent fund of this House.

On motion, it was Ordered, That so much of a letter, dated the thirteenth ultimo, from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Chairman of the Committee to whom were referred the letters of Edward Tiffin, President of the Convention of Ohio, and Thomas Worthington, special agent of the said State, together with a copy of the constitution thereof, and sundry propositions in addition to, and in modification of, those contained in an act passed at the last session of Congress, as relates to the sale of lands, the property of the United States, within the said State of Ohio, be referred to the committee appointed the seventeenth of December last, on that part of the Message from the President of the United States, of the fifteenth of the same month, which "relates to our concerns with the Indian tribes, and the establishment of a new settlement."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Moses White; and, after some time spent therein the bill was reported without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. EARLY, from the committee to whom were referred, on the fourth instant, a letter and report from the Secretary of War, accompanied with sundry documents, respecting claims against the United States, for services of the militia of the State of Georgia, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. HILL, from the committee to whom was recommitted, on the seventh instant, an engrossed bill to prevent the importation of certain persons, whose admission is prohibited by certain laws of the State Governments, reported an amendatory bill to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of State, of the twenty-fifth ultimo, on the memorial of Tobias Lear; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and were refused leave to sit again.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House be discharged from the farther consideration thereof; and that the said report and memorial, together with the documents accompanying the same, be recommitted to a Committee of Claims.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the committee appointed, on the memorial of the City of Washington, and Alexandria, reported a bill for establishing the Government of Columbia.

This bill establishes a Legislature, composed of a House of Representatives to be chosen annually, and a Senate to be chosen biennially, by the free-men who have resided in the Territory twelve months and paid taxes. No person to be eligible as a member of the House of Representatives unless resident in the Territory for three years, and possessed of a freehold for the same time; and no person to be eligible as a member of the Senate unless possessed of property in value amounting to five hundred dollars.—Referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

OHIO SCHOOL FUND.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee of the second instant, to whom were referred, on the twenty-third of December last, a letter from Edward Tiffin, President of the Convention of Ohio, and a letter from Thomas Worthington, special agent of the said State, enclosing a copy of the constitution thereof, together with sundry propositions in addition to, and in modification of, those contained in an act passed at the last session of Congress; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the resolutions contained therein, with two amendments, which being severally read, the first amendment was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to, and the other disagreed to by the House.

The said resolutions, as amended, were again severally read, at the Clerk's table, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

1. Resolved, That a donation, equal to one thirty-sixth part of the amount of the lands in the United States' Military Tract, within the State of Ohio, be made, for the support of schools within that tract.

2. Resolved, That a donation equal to one thirty-sixth part of the County of Trumbull, be made, out of the lands within the United States' Military Tract, for the support of schools within the said County of Trumbull.

3. Resolved, That a donation equal to one thirty-sixth part of the Virginia reservation, so far as the unlocated lands, within that reservation, (after the warrants issued by that State shall have been first satisfied,) will supply the same, be made, for the support of schools in the district contained between the Scioto and Little Miami rivers.

4. Resolved, That a like provision, for the use of schools, be made, out of any lands which may hereafter be acquired from the Indian tribes.

5. Resolved, That the lands which now are, or hereafter may be, appropriated to the use of schools within the State of Ohio, be vested in the Legislature thereof, in trust for that object.

6. Resolved, That not less than three-fifths of the sum offered to be appropriated by Congress, for the opening of roads, from the Western to the Atlantic waters, shall be appropriated, under the direction of the State of Ohio, for the laying out of roads within that State.

7. Resolved, That, in lieu of the township proposed to be granted for the use of an academy, by the act passed the fifth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, there be granted to the State of Ohio, for the purposes described in that act, one other entire township, within the district of Cincinnati; provided that the State of Ohio shall relinquish to the United States, all their claims, under the act aforesaid, against the said John C. Symmes.

8. Resolved, That these propositions shall depend on the compliance, by the State of Ohio, with the provisions of the third proposition, and second section of the aforesaid act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," passed the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. ELMENDORF, Mr. GODDARD, Mr. HENDERSON, and Mr. ARCHER, do prepare and bring in the same.

INDIAN TRIBES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee of the thirty-first ultimo, on so much of the Message from the President of the United States, of the fifteenth ultimo, "as relates to our concerns with the Indian tribes, and the establishment of a new settlement;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the resolutions contained therein; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the law passed on the eighteenth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, and which was revived and continued by another law, passed on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, ought to be farther continued, with the appropriations therefor, for the term of two years, from the fourth day of March next; and from thence until the end of the next session of Congress.

2. Resolved, That an additional sum of ten thousand dollars ought to be appropriated, to enable the Executive to embrace any favorable opportunity of obtaining farther cessions of land from the Indians.

3. Resolved, That the sum of two thousand dollars ought to be appropriated, for the purpose of procuring articles necessary to the establishment of salt-works on the Wabash river; and that the Executive ought to be authorized to lease the same for a term not exceeding — years, to one or more persons, as shall appear most advantageous to the public, and on conditions which shall insure the working of them.

4. Resolved, That an office ought to be opened for the sale of land, within the Mississippi Territory, to which the Indian title has been, or shall be extinguished, on conditions which shall guard against monopoly, and encourage the actual settlement of the same; and that prompt measures ought to be taken for the adjustment of all existing rights and claims within the said Territory.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. DAWSON, Mr. THOMAS MORRIS, Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. MERIWETHER, do prepare and bring in the same.

PRESERVATION OF TIMBER.

On the call of Mr. NEWTON, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation of $50,000, for the preservation of timber on navy yards and for the improvement thereof.

Mr. RANDOLPH considered this bill entirely unnecessary, as it made a partial appropriation that would be fully embraced in the general naval appropriations.

Mr. S. SMITH moved an amendment desiring the appropriation of $50,000, by prescribing that $10,000 should be appropriated to each of the yards of Charlestown, New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk, and $5,000 to Washington, and a like sum to Portsmouth.

A debate ensued, in which Messrs. S. SMITH, GRISWOLD, MITCHILL, NEWTON, and MOTT, supported, and Messrs. RANDOLPH, MACON, SMILIE, and EUSTIS, opposed the bill; when Mr. SMILIE observed that as the only difference of opinion related to the sum, he should move that the Committee should rise; when risen, he should move a postponement of the bill until the general appropriation bill should be taken up.

The question on the rising of the Committee, was carried—yeas 46, nays 33. The Committee rose, when leave was refused them to sit again, and the bill referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

FRIDAY, February 11.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Moses White was read the time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of State on the petition of William Wilson, John Potts, and David Easton, referred to him by order of the House on the seventeenth ultimo; which was read, and, together with the said petition and the documents accompanying the same, ordered to be committed to the Committee of Claims.

The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the supplementary report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, of the twenty-sixth ultimo, to whom was recommitted their report on the petition of Samuel Corp; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the resolution contained therein; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Collector of the port of New York be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay Samuel Corp the amount of three debentures, payable in April, June, and August, one thousand eight hundred, which were issued to him on account of goods exported by him to New Orleans on board the ship Chesapeake, Captain Tombs, in the month of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety nine; provided that every requisite, agreeably to law, for the obtaining such drawbacks, shall have been complied with.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures do prepare and bring in the same.

A petition, in the French language, of sundry inhabitants of Post Saint Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory of the United States, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, complaining of intrusion of the citizens of the United States, on lands which the petitioners claim, under a title from certain Indian tribes, and of other grievances therein specified, to which they have been, and now are, subjected; and praying the interposition of Congress to redress the same; also, that a small portion of wood-land on each side of the Oubache river, adjoining the lands which they now possess, may be granted for the common use and benefit of the petitioners.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed the eighth instant, on a letter from William Henry Harrison, President of the Convention, and a memorial of the inhabitants of the Indiana Territory of the United States.

Mr JONES, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 28th ultimo, a letter from David Humphreys, relative to the disposition of certain presents which he received from the Dey of Algiers and the King of Spain, whilst in the capacities of Minister Resident of the United States, at the Court of Lisbon, and Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of Madrid, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

On motion of Mr. HELMS, the House went into Committee of the Whole, Mr. J. C. SMITH in the Chair, on the following bill:

A Bill to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war.

Be it enacted, &c., by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any commissioned officer, non-commissioned officer, soldier, or seaman, disabled in the actual service of the United States, by wounds received during the Revolutionary war, and who did not desert the said service, shall be entitled to be placed on the pension list of the United States during life: Provided,

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Revolutionary Pensioners.

H. OF R.

That in substantiating the claims thereto, the rules and regulations following, shall be complied with.

First. All evidence shall be taken on oath or affirmation, before the judge of the district in which such invalid resides, or before some person specially authorized by commission from the said judge.

Secondly. The evidence relative to any claimant must prove decisive disability to have been the effect of known wounds received while in the actual line of his duty, in the service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war; that this evidence must be the affidavits of the commanding officer or surgeon of the ship, regiment, corps, or company, in which such claimant served, or two other credible witnesses to the same effect, setting forth the time and place of such known wound.

Thirdly. Every claimant shall be examined on oath or affirmation, by some respectable physician or surgeon, to be authorized by commission from the said judge, who shall report in writing his opinion, upon oath or affirmation, of the nature of said disability, and in what degree it prevents the claimant from obtaining his livelihood.

Fourthly. Every claimant must produce evidence of his having continued in the service of the United States, to the conclusion of the war in seventeen hundred and eighty-three, or being left out of the service in consequence of his disability, or in consequence of derangement of the army, and of the mode of life or employment he has since followed, and of the original existence and continuance of his disability.

Fifthly. Every claimant must show satisfactory cause to the said judge of the district, why he did not apply for a pension, in conformity to laws heretofore passed, before the expiration of the limitation thereof.

Sixthly. No evidence of any claimant shall be admitted whose claim has heretofore been legally examined and rejected.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said judge of the district shall give to each claimant a transcript of the evidence and proceedings had respecting his claim; and shall also transmit a list of such claims, accompanied by the evidence herein directed, to the Secretary of the Department of War, in order that the same may be compared with the muster rolls and other documents in his office, and if found to accord therewith, the applicants are thenceforth to be placed on the pension list of the United States: Provided, That in no case a pension shall commence before the first day of January, eighteen hundred and three, except so far as to offset the commutation of half pay received by such officers, in which case the proper officer is to calculate the pension from the first day of January, seventeen hundred and eighty-four.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the pensions allowed by this act shall be estimated in the manner following, that is to say: a pension to a commissioned officer shall be considered the one half of his monthly pay, as by law established, and the proportions less than a full pension, shall be the like proportion of half pay. And a full pension to a non-commissioned officer, private, soldier, or seaman, shall be five dollars per month, and the proportion less than a full pension shall be the like proportions of five dollars per month.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the pensions becoming due in virtue of this act, shall be paid in the same manner as invalid pensions are paid, who have heretofore been placed on the pension list of the United States, under such restrictions and regulations, in all respects, as are prescribed by the laws of the United States, in such cases provided.

7th Con. 2d Ses.—17

Mr. ELMER moved to strike out the sixth rule in the first section.

Mr. GRISWOLD said the effect of this motion being adopted would be to open the door to all claims whatever, though they had been fully examined and rejected. He was therefore against it.

Mr. ELMER replied that almost all the claims rejected, had been rejected because sufficient testimony had not been produced before the expiration of the last law, and not from an inability in the applicants to produce satisfactory testimony in case they had been indulged with time.

The amendment was lost—yeas 20.

The second section being under consideration,

Mr. EVRIS observed that it was extremely disagreeable to object to a bill whose object was so beneficent, but he was persuaded that it was impossible for the judges to execute the duties assigned them. Against the exercise of like duties they had already protested. The number of persons having just claims on the Government was extremely small; and this provision will encourage a great mass of fruitless applications; whereby great expense would be incurred by the applicants without any remuneration. He hoped, therefore, the Secretary of War would be suffered to receive the applications; and be authorized to institute a proper tribunal for the decision of claims; or to make report to Congress. His objection to imposing the duties on the judges was insurmountable. They could not coolly investigate in one court the merits of each particular case. When an applicant appeared before them, whose very appearance indicated his wretchedness, there would be too powerful an address to their sensibilities as men to resist his demand; and they would generously and magnanimously allow him, without rigid inquiry, what he claimed.

Mr. S. SMITH said he liked the bill as it stood, better than he should if it were altered conformably to the wishes of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He was inclined to think military men would be more liberal than the judges. If he were in such a situation, he knew he should. And what was the danger to be apprehended from such a fellow feeling?

The greatest danger was that some unfortunate wretch, who had too much pride to apply for relief until his distresses forced him, should obtain the relief which his country had awarded him for risking his life and his all in defence of his country's freedom. Suppose that one, two, or three, or that even one, two or three hundred, of these unfortunate men should get on the pension list, and that in most of the cases in which relief was furnished Government were deceived? He would give his consent to the provision, if but twenty worthy men of the number, that were now excluded, were brought on the list.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill with amendments.

SATURDAY, February 12.

Ordered, That the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio," be recommended to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the sufferers by fire, in the town of Portsmouth;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to consider the said amendment at the Clerk's table; and the same being twice read, the question was taken, that the House do concur with the Committee of the whole House in their agreement to the said amendment, and resolved in the affirmative.

The House, resolved into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within the State of Ohio;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported to the House without amendment.

The said bill was then read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported to the House with amendments, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. DAVIS, from the committee appointed, on the 25th ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of concentrating the several public offices and other public buildings belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington," made a report thereon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was read, in the words following, to wit:

"That, in their opinion, no alteration ought to be made in the sites of the public offices or other public buildings belonging to the United States, in the City of Washington."

The House proceeded to consider the said report at the Clerk's table; and the same being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Mr. HUGER, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the fostering the fisheries of the United States, made a report. It concluded with the following resolutions:

1st. Ships and vessels actually employed in the cod and whale fisheries shall not in future be subject to the payment of duty on their tonnage.

2d. Fishermen and other persons actually employed in navigating the said vessels, shall not in future be liable to the payment of hospital money.

3d. The owners of, and persons navigating vessels actually employed in the codfisheries, which may be shipwrecked or otherwise lost, whilst so employed, shall nevertheless receive such bounty, as they would otherwise have been entitled to under the different acts of Congress, heretofore passed on the subject of the fisheries.

The report was ordered to be printed, and referred to a Committee of the whole House for Tuesday next.

Mr. EUSTIS moved the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for making such alterations in the Capitol, as may be necessary for the future accommodation of Congress.

"Resolved, That the sum of ——— dollars be appropriated for the same."

Resolved, That the said motion be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed, on the twenty-ninth of December last, "to inquire into the propriety of granting further time to proprietors or holders of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same;" who were instructed by a resolution of this House, of the twenty-sixth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the proprietors or holders of military land warrants to locate their respective claims on a less quantity than four thousand acres;" and to whom were referred, on the fourth instant, two reports of the Secretary of War: one on the claims to lands for military services; the other, on claims for duplicates of warrants issued from the land office of Virginia, and plats and certificates of surveys founded on such warrants, suggested to have been lost or destroyed; made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

"Resolved, That further time ought to be given to the holders or proprietors of military land warrants to obtain and locate the same.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, to enable persons holding military land warrants, by transfer or assignment, to locate them on a less quantity than four thousand acres.

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, authorizing the Secretary of War to receive from the twenty separate claimants for military bounty lands, as mentioned in his report, duplicates or certified copies from the proper offices, of any warrants, plats, or surveys, in lieu of the original, upon satisfactory proof that the same have been lost or destroyed; and upon the receipt of copies, as aforesaid, to issue patents to the said twenty claimants, upon proof that every other requisite of the law has been complied with; and also, to issue warrants to the two hundred and fifty-four persons whose claims, in the opinion of the Secretary, have been substantiated."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. CLAY, Mr. THATCHER, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. MITCHELL moved the following resolution:

"Resolved That a joint committee of both Houses be appointed to inquire into the state of the public buildings in the City of Washington, and to report what repairs are necessary for their preservation, with the probable expense of such repairs."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House, to whom was this day referred a motion relative to a provision for making such alterations in the Capitol as may be necessary for the future accommodation of Congress.

DISCRIMINATING DUTIES.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to allow a drawback of duty on sugar refined within the United States; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

Mr. DANA inquired whether it was intended to take up the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures on the repeal of discriminating and countervailing duties.

Mr. S. SMITH replied that he considered the subject of great importance, and had been extremely anxious to have it discussed and decided upon during the present session. But as the consideration of it had been protracted to so late a period as to render it impracticable to carry into effect the necessary provisions in case the report should be adopted, he was willing to discharge the Committee of the Whole from a further consideration of it.

Mr. MITCHELL observed that he was considerably disappointed at hearing the motion to discharge the Committee. He had hoped that the projected repeal of the discriminating and countervailing duties between the United States and Great Britain, would have been the subject of a public discussion. Much benefit might be expected from a debate in this House, and he therefore had hoped that the merits of the resolution contemplated would have been debated. Much light had been shed on this complicated inquiry already. Ever since the first motion made during the last session by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. S. SMITH,) great attention had been given to the subject by almost all classes of people. Merchants and legislators had particularly studied its details, and he thought it was much better understood now by all parties than it was a year ago; and, by a further examination in the Committee of the Whole, he hoped much greater advances would still be made. He, however, was inclined to think that public opinion was not yet ripe for an ultimate decision in favor of the repeal. There was no probability of adopting it, even if it should be argued. The discussion would merely end in a postponement, indefinitely, to some future day. There being, then, no chance of carrying it into operation, and the House being much pressed with more urgent business that ought to be acted upon with all despatch, he felt willing to let the project drop in this way. However speculative men might think on the point, the great body of practical men bore strong testimony against it. He, therefore, on considering the circumstances, should favor the motion, though it met him unexpectedly, and vote for discharging the Committee of the Whole from all further consideration of the meditated repeal of the discriminating and countervailing duties.

The discharge of the Committee of the Whole was carried without a division.

And the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 14.

Mr. BRENT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning the assurance of buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Ordered, That the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, accompanied with sundry statements exhibiting the proceedings which have been authorized by the Board, since their report of the sixteenth of December, one thousand eight hundred and one, which were read, and ordered to lie on the table, on the seventh instant, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

An engrossed bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act providing passports for the ships and vessels of the United States," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting the laws which have been adopted in the Indiana Territory, from January, 1801, to February, 1802, as forwarded to the office of the Secretary of State. The Message was read, and, together with the laws therein referred to, ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the granting of clearances to ships or vessels of the United States, lying in the river Mississippi, south of the Southern boundary of the United States; and therein to amend an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have disagreed to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Hugh Alexander, and others."

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States," and to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of imports and tonnage; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for granting of clearances to ships or vessels of the United States, lying in the river Mississippi, south of the Southern boundary of the United States; and therein to amend an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' and for other purposes." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to said amendments.

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, after adopting several amendments, which were taken up in the House.

Mr. VAN RENSSLAER moved an amendment, which should make provision for those who had been disabled in the service, since the Revolution, in the Indian war; he had observed, in his examinations at the War Office, that several of Wayne's army, would have been entitled to a place on the pension list, had they applied in season.

The amendment was lost.

The SPEAKER said, if no further amendments were offered, the question would then recur upon the engrossment of the bill for a third reading.

Mr. GRISWOLD was opposed to the bill, and should vote against the engrossment. It would open too wide a door. It opened a door for every one who had received the least wound in the Revolutionary war to enter a claim; the whole community would be called upon to prove facts and circumstances; and in every case where a wound had been, or was declared to have been received, if the situation of the person was disagreeable, if he was not wealthy, his neighbors would feel for him, and would recommend him to the Government, in order to be freed from the trouble of providing for him themselves. Under these circumstances the Government would be frequently subjected to fraud. What had the Government done? Everything which was reasonable and proper for them to do. Commissioners had been appointed in every part of the United States. And the period for receiving claims, and hearing evidence, had been extended from one time to another. Was it not to be supposed, that those who had neglected to produce their claims, were not entitled to the relief which the bill provided? There were undoubtedly some individuals, who, from pride, or some other cause, had not made their situation public; but was it reasonable and proper, for this cause, to open a door at which the poor of every State, county, town, and parish, in the Union might enter? It would induce exertion on the part of those corporations, to bring them forward, in order to relieve themselves from the expense of supporting them. There might be a few cases, as gentlemen had stated, to which the General Government should extend their relief. But however powerful benevolence might plead in their favor, justice did not demand this excess of generosity.

Mr. RANDOLPH could not see why a longer time should not be given to those who had claims on the bounty of the Government, as well as for the extension of the time for locating land warrants. He could not conceive that there was a distinction between the man who was entitled to compensation for services, and the man who held a land warrant, which had been issued as a compensation for similar services. A law, he said, was about to be passed, giving further time to the holders of military land warrants to locate the same. If they were not barred by an act of limitation, why should the disabled pensioner be limited? They had been told that every pauper of the United States, who was then a parochial charge, would be thrown upon the Government of the Union. And he would ask why not? Where was there a stronger obligation on the Government, than to relieve the men who had fought our battles during the Revolutionary war? The bill in question was a law to enforce a moral obligation on the Government. There were many persons who would not, or had not applied under the former law, who would apply now. He said he should vote for the bill.

Mr. S. SMITH said that in many of the States, particularly the one to which the gentleman (Mr. GRISWOLD) belonged, the situations of these people were known. The State being divided into small towns, the inhabitants were known to each other, and those who were entitled to pensions were advised as to the proper mode of obtaining them. He believed it would be found that every man in that State (Connecticut) was on the pension list who ought to be placed there; while Maryland had but five on the list, although she furnished as many soldiers as Connecticut. He would not say, however, that those of the latter were improperly recorded. If the gentleman (Mr. G.) would cast his eye over the records, he would be convinced that something ought to be done. Suppose the Government should pay two or three thousand dollars a year to fraudulent applicants, it would be better than to deprive even twenty of a claim to which their services justly entitled them.

Mr. VARNUM agreed with the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD.) He was willing to make provision which should include all who had the same claim on public justice. When people talked of moral obligation, he wished to know why they would exclude so large a portion of those who were equally entitled to relief; all those who were engaged in the commencement of the war, and who received wounds that were felt at this day—all those who were enlisted in the first year of the war; he knew fifty instances of those who had received wounds at that time. If that was moral justice, he had not before known what it was. He would go all lengths, and give equal justice, but to that partial mode of proceeding he would never give his assent.

The question for engrossment was taken and carried in the affirmative—yeas 51.

ALIENS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. LEIB presented sundry memorials from aliens of Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the naturalization act.

The Clerk began the reading of the memorials, when

Mr. SMILIE doubted the necessity of reading the memorials; which he believed were the same, verbatim, with those already presented, and which the House had refused to refer.

Militia System.

H. of R.

Mr. LEIB replied that the exceptionable expressions contained in those memorials were not in these.

The reading of the memorials was finished.

Mr. GODDARD thought, as these memorials were of a similar nature with those presented the last session, on which the House had acted, it would be unnecessary to take any order on them.

Mr. LEIB said this was not the case. The prayer of the memorials and their contents were very different from those offered the last session. He trusted, therefore, they would be treated in the same manner with other petitions, and be referred.

Mr. BACON hoped they would be referred, especially as the reference of these petitions, which were respectfully drawn, would be the strongest indication of the displeasure of the House as to the other petitions, couched in different terms.

Mr. GODDARD withdrew his opposition, when the reference obtained.

MILITIA SYSTEM.

Mr. VARNUM called up the report of a select committee, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President as relates to the militia.

The report of the committee was agreed to, with sundry amendments; when the Committee rose, and the House took up the report of the committee.

The House concurred in the resolution, which, in connexion with the report of the select committee, is as follows:

"That, after a full investigation of the subject, they are of opinion, that a law which passed the eighth day of May, 1792, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States," embraces all the objects of a militia institution, delegated to Congress; the principles of that law lay the foundation of a militia system, on the broad basis prescribed by the Constitution, and are well calculated to insure a complete national defence, if carried into effect by the State governments, agreeably to the power reserved to the States, respectively, by the Constitution, and therefore ought not to be altered. But, although the committee are of opinion that the principles of the system established on the part of the United States ought to be adhered to, yet they believe that some small alterations in the details of these principles would render that system still more efficacious, and have reported a bill for that purpose.

"In those States which have taken energetic measures for carrying into effect the system adopted by Congress, agreeably to the power constitutionally vested in them, the militia are making great proficiency in military discipline, and in the knowledge of tactics, which shows that the deficiency in organization, arming, and discipline of the militia, which is too apparent in some of the States, does not arise from any defect in that part of the system which is under the control of Congress; but from omission on the part of the State governments.

"In order, therefore, to impress the State Governments with the importance of the subject, and the indispensable necessity of their vigorous co-operation with the General Government, to complete the militia institution, so as to insure, from that source, a permanent national defence, they submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to write to the Executive of each State, urging the importance and indispensable necessity of vigorous exertions, on the part of the State governments, to carry into effect the militia system adopted by the National Legislature, agreeably to the powers reserved to the States, respectively, by the Constitution of the United States, and in a manner the best calculated to insure such a degree of military discipline and knowledge of tactics, as will, under the auspices of a benign Providence, render the militia a sure and permanent bulwark of national defence."

MESSRS. VARNUM and BUTLER were appointed a committee to wait on the President with the resolution.

Several amendments made in the bill above alluded to were agreed to, and others made; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

TUESDAY, February 15.

An engrossed bill to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds, received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary War, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing an uniform militia throughout the United States," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. HELMS, from the committee appointed, on the twelfth of January last, "to inquire whether any and what provision ought to be made, by law, for allowing pensions to persons who do, at this time, labor under disabilities in consequence of known wounds received in the actual service of the United States, and who have not heretofore been provided for," who were instructed by a resolution of this House, of the fourteenth of the same month, "to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for settlement of claims for services rendered, and supplies furnished, during the Revolutionary war," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and three; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for continuing in force a law, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the tenth ultimo, a petition of Hezekiah Prince, and others, owners and masters of vessels within the United States, reported a bill for erecting a light-house at the entrance of Penobscot bay, or any other place, in its vicinity, that may be deemed preferable by the Secretary of the Treasury; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the twenty-seventh ultimo, to whom was referred a petition of the Mayor and Commonalty of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the resolutions contained therein; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the regulation of quarantine within the District of Columbia.

Resolved, That so much of the memorial of the Mayor and Commonalty of the town of Alexandria, as prays for a reimbursement of money by them expended in executing the quarantine law of Virginia, is unreasonable, and ought not to be granted.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the first resolution; and that Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. EUSTIS, and Mr. ELMER, do prepare and bring in the same.

CLAIMS OF GEORGIA

On motion of Mr. EARLY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Secretary of War, respecting claims against the United States for services of the militia of the State of Georgia.

Mr. EARLY, with great clearness and precision, gave a statement of facts and circumstances relating to this transaction, and adduced many strong arguments in favor of the claim. [See post, p. 535.]

He was followed by Mr. RANDOLPH, in opposition; upon the principle that the debt had been cancelled by the late negotiation between the joint commissioners of the State of Georgia, and the commissioners of the United States.

Mr. GREGG was not seriously inclined to oppose the claim, though he was not prepared to give a final vote. He wished the Committee to rise.

Mr. MACON wished the Committee to rise.

Mr. RANDOLPH opposed their rising.

Mr. NICHOLSON made a few remarks on the question, whether this claim was included in the contract between the Commissioners of the State of Georgia and the United States. He wished for some information on that point.

Mr. S. SMITH was opposed to the Committee's rising; and was in favor of the claim.

Mr. MATTOON was opposed altogether to the claim.

Mr. MERIWETHER spoke in favor.

Mr. BAYARD moved for the Committee to rise. He stated his desire to be informed, and said that more intelligence was acquired the further the subject was investigated.

Mr. S. SMITH again opposed the rising of the Committee.

The question was taken and carried in the affirmative. Yeas 59.

The Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 16.

A memorial and petition of Joshua Harvey, and others, citizens of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, was presented to the House and read, stating that they have been declared bankrupts, in conformity with the provisions contained in the law passed on the subject of bankruptcy: that, previous to the passage of the said law, the memorialists had become bound to the United States, in bonds, partly as principals, and partly as securities, for certain sums to their names severally annexed, which bonds were given to secure the payment of duties on goods imported into the port of Baltimore, and are still unpaid; and praying that an act may be passed to discharge from all debts due to the United States, such persons as have obtained, or may obtain certificates of discharge under the aforesaid act on the subject of bankruptcy; or that such other relief may be afforded to the memorialists, in the premises, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to Messrs. BAYARD, NICHOLSON, and BRENT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred, on the eleventh instant, the petition of the inhabitants of the island and town of Nantucket, in the State of Massachusetts, made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to employ proper and intelligent persons to take a survey of the harbor in the island of Nantucket, and the bar and shoals near the same, as far as may be requisite, and to report their opinion as to the measures necessary to secure a sufficient channel for loaded ships destined for that port, with an estimate of the probable expenses.

Mr. I. SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to establish a building and fire insurance company in the City of Washington; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

Mr. SOUTHWARD, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to revive, and continue in force, an act, in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to 'An act regulating the grants of lands appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen,'" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the act entitled, "An act for the amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government for the Mississippi Territory," on the claims made by settlers, and other persons, to lands within the Territory situate west of the river Chatahoochee, and south of the cession made to the United States by South Carolina, in obedience to the provisions of the act supplemental to the said recited act; which was read, and ordered to be referred to MESSRS. NICHOLSON, TENNEY, GREGG, VAN RENSSELAER, and ROBERT WILLIAMS; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to bring in a bill or bills, making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and three.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill with the title and to the effect recited in, and prescribed by, the foregoing order of the House; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Saturday next.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Samuel Corp, which was reported to the House, without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States;" and to the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two amendments thereto; which were, severally, twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited.

Mr. HASTINGS moved to amend the bill so as to prohibit the importation only of French negroes and persons of color.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. HILL and BACON, and lost, without a division.

Mr. S. SMITH moved to except from the operations of the bill, seamen, natives of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

The motion was supported by Mr. HILL, and opposed by Messrs. NEWTON, LOWNDES, and MOTT, and lost.

Mr. HASTINGS moved to strike out the sum of one thousand dollars, the penalty annexed to the importation of each person, and to insert ten dollars. Lost, without a division.

The bill, after undergoing some slight amendments, was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial System of the United States." The bill is as follows:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the circuit court of the second circuit shall consist of the justice of the Supreme Court residing within the third circuit, and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden.

In the third circuit, the said circuit court shall consist of the justice of the Supreme Court residing within the fourth circuit, and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden.

In the fourth circuit, the said circuit court shall consist of the senior associate justice of the Supreme Court residing within the fifth circuit, and the district judge of the district where such court shall be holden.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the senior associate justice, resident in the fifth circuit, shall attend at the City of Washington, on the first Monday of August, in each and every year, who shall possess the same powers, and is required to perform the same duties as are prescribed in the second section of the act, entitled "An act to amend the Judicial System of the United States."

Mr. ELMER moved to strike out the first section. He thought greater inconveniences would arise from the change proposed in this bill than from the present arrangements.

Mr. BAYARD said the principal object of the bill was to accommodate Judge Washington, by altering the allotment of the judges of the Supreme Court, which would be effected without disaccommodating the other judges, and with their entire approbation.

Mr. LEIS said he had seconded the motion to strike out the first section, and he hoped it would prevail. He was not of opinion that the convenience of the judges should alone be consulted. The public convenience should also be regarded. He hoped the present distribution of the judges would continue; because one of the judges (Judge Chase) was so precious in the estimation of Maryland, where he now acted, he was in favor of continuing him there, in preference to translating him to Pennsylvania, where he might not perhaps be held in so precious a point of view.

Mr. SMILIE was in favor of striking out the first section. The convenience of the judges ought to be attended to; but if, by the arrangement of this bill, a greater inconvenience will attach to the people, the judges ought to endure their present inconvenience rather than expose the nation to one that would be greater. He considered the convenience of the people the more important. It would not give satisfaction to the people of the State he represented (Pennsylvania) to make this alteration. They were satisfied with their present judge, (Mr. Paterson.) They would not be satisfied with the judge proposed to be given them. He hoped, therefore, the House would not impose upon them what they would deem an evil.

Mr. MOTT was for striking out the first section to kill the bill altogether. He did not think the accommodation of one judge was a sufficient ground for the bill. The State he represented (New Jersey) would be displeased with the change proposed by the bill, as there was not in the Union a man more obnoxious in that State than the judge contemplated to be given them.

Mr. EUSTIS was against the motion to strike out the first section, as it was calculated to remove a great inconvenience attached to the duties of a particular judge, and as there was no reason offered in favor of it which ought, in his opinion, to influence the House. In the assignment of duties, the Congress ought not to know any of the judges, but ought to presume that they were all equally learned and agreeable to the people.

Mr. RUTLEDGE observed, that the duties assigned to Judge Washington were extremely inconvenient. He was obliged to ride from Virginia to Vermont. The judges, he presumed, were all learned and upright. If any of them failed to discharge their duty, the regular course of proceeding was known to the House. He had never understood the cause of the arrangement which submitted Judge Washington to this inconvenience, until he learned that that gentleman had, some time since, contemplated a residence in Connecticut; under which impression the present arrangement had been made.

Mr. ELMENDORF viewed the subject differently from any gentleman who had spoken on the subject. It appeared to him that a judge, by being permanently assigned to a particular circuit, would become better acquainted with the laws of the States embraced within his circuit. He therefore thought Congress should legislate but once in making a proper distribution of the judges.

Mr. BAYARD said it must be apparent that the whole discussion consisted in what might be termed argumentum ad hominem.

After making some remarks on the propriety of the change contemplated in the bill, he said that he believed an upright judge would always be inimical to traitors, insurgents, and libellers. He believed that Judge Chase had been considered in some measure harsh in his treatment of this description of persons. But in civil cases, he never heard the least imputation thrown upon his conduct, even by his enemies. The laws under which those prosecutions were conducted were now expired, and considering the mildness of the present Administration, he did not conceive that there was any danger of falling under the lash of the learned judge. It was extremely evident this was a matter with which the people had nothing to do, as the only question was, whether they should have for their judge A or B? It had been well observed by a gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EUSTIS,) that the House ought to consider every judge equally learned and upright. It was, therefore, not regular or delicate to make such remarks. The boon prayed was very small, as in the event of the death of any one judge, the judges would themselves have the right of allotting themselves. He could not believe that any gentleman entertained such hostility to the judges as to wish to defeat a measure barely because it would promote their convenience, and on which they were all agreed.

Mr. HOLLAND observed, that he would be in favor of this law, inasmuch as it promoted the convenience of Judge Washington, were it not that it interfered with the convenience of two respectable States.

Mr. SMILIE was sorry that he was obliged to assign the reasons for the opinions he had advanced. But this became necessary from the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD.) That gentleman has said the judge alluded to may have been harsh in his treatment of traitors, insurgents, and libellers. In the remarks he had to make, Mr. S. said, he should pass over whatever related to libels and sedition, and confine himself to the observations of the gentleman that related to treason. He hoped he should never see the time when the character of any judge should be considered too sacred to be noticed on fit occasions in that House. It was not that he had on this occasion anything to say because the judge (Chase) had been too severe upon traitors, insurgents, or libellers, but because he had construed an act of insurgency into treason. This was essentially a different thing. There was an insurrection in Pennsylvania, in the county of Northampton—

Mr. VARNUM asked if there was any propriety, in the discussion of the question before the Committee, in commenting on the character of a judge?

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the gentleman would proceed.

Mr. SMILIE proceeded.—There was an insurrection in Pennsylvania, in the county of Northampton. A person of the name of Fries, concerned in that insurrection, was tried for treason. When the trial came on, and the counsel of Fries appeared, the judge (Chase) said the court would not hear an argument as to what was or was not treason. We have, said he, already decided this point; our opinion is drawn out in writing, and you must be governed by it. Fries had employed two of the most eminent counsel of the Pennsylvania bar, who, it might be proper to remark, were of different political sentiments. But, notwithstanding their political difference, when the judge behaved in this manner, they unitedly told him we will not degrade our professional characters, or commit the rights of our client, in whose service we have volunteered, by taking any further part in these proceedings. There are rights of the bar as well as the rights of the bench; and while we respect the latter, we will maintain the former. The effect was that this man (Fries) was tried without counsel, convicted of treason, and sentenced to death. After the trial the Attorney General requested the notes of several gentlemen of the bar present during the trial, which were given, in which they cited a number of the most approved authorities from the books to show that the crime committed by Fries was not an act of treason, but that it was particularly designated in the Sedition act. The opinions and authorities went to the President, and Fries was pardoned.

Of the abilities of this judge, Mr. S. entertained no doubt, as little as he entertained of the abilities of Jeffries.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Bankruptcy.

H. of R.

These circumstances having happened in Pennsylvania was the reason why he was opposed to the assignment of Judge Chase to the State he represented. Whenever justice was administered, the citizens ought to have confidence in those who administered it; and it would be wrong in the House to force upon the State he represented a man as a judge that would be considered as an evil.

Mr. BACON said the mention of the circumstances stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was rather disagreeable. It might, perhaps, be necessary. But he did not think the trial of the judges was then before the House. The only solid objection to the bill is this: that there are strong and peculiar prejudices in some parts of the Union against a certain judge. Whether these were reasonable or not, it was a query whether the laws could be administered as well under a person against whom there exists a fixed prejudice, however unfounded that prejudice may be, as under persons against whom such prejudice does not exist. In this view of the subject, the objection was not entirely without weight. It was certainly of great importance that all our officers, but particularly our judicial officers, should be treated with respect; and if, in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, a certain judge is not duly respected, that might furnish an argument against the bill.

Mr. BAYARD said he believed the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) was correct in saying that a man of the name of Fries had been tried and convicted of treason. He believed, also, there were many other men guilty of insurgency and treason who had neither been tried nor convicted of treason. He further believed that any man guilty of the crime of insurgency or treason would look upon the judge as a Jeffries. But he did not know what the character of Judge Chase had to do with the provisions of the bill on the table. No man had impeached that judge; and that was the only regular or Constitutional mode of criminating a judge in that House. If the judge had construed an opposition to a particular law into treason, and by a false, and, he presumed, what gentleman meant to insinuate a corrupt decision, jeopardized the life of a citizen, only ultimately saved by the clemency of the President, was it not the duty of those who thought so to impeach him? Was not this the duty of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? This would be fair, honorable, and open. The charges would be regularly made, and the judge would be heard in his defence. If the gentleman believed the judge guilty of the charges he had made, it was a duty to himself and to the American people to bring them forward in the shape of an impeachment. But the gentleman has assumed the character of a reporter of law cases without the capacity. No doctrine had been laid down in the case of Fries that had not been acceded to by the whole bench; and he believed if any judge whatever had been on the bench he would have made the same decision. It was extremely possible for cases to arise in which the court shall decide after the fullest argument and the most mature deliberation, and which it will not be necessary to examine again. The court may say we have fully considered the case, and do not require any further arguments. This was not the doctrine of a Jeffries, but of a Hale and a Camden, those luminaries of law, and ornaments of the English bench.

Mr. BAYARD concluded by saying he regretted that such an extrinsic discussion should have been introduced into the debate; but he hoped the majority of the House would grant the request of the judges.

The question was then taken on striking out the first section, and carried—yeas 42, nays 36.

The second section was agreed to; when the Committee rose and reported the bill, and the House immediately took up the report, when, on motion of Mr. MORR, the yeas and nays were taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole, in their disagreement to the first section of the bill, and carried—yeas 48, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—John Bacon, Robert Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, William Dickson, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezer Elmer, John Fowler, Edwin Gray, Andrew Gregg, John A. Hanna, Joseph Heister, William Helms, William Hoge, James Holland, David Holmes, Michael Leib, David Meriwether, Samuel L. Mitchell, James Mott, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Joseph H. Upham, Philip Van Cortlandt, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until Saturday next.

BANKRUPTCY.

The order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the committee, of the thirteenth of January last, to whom was referred the petition of Josiah Fox, and others, inhabitants of the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia; and who were also instructed, by a resolution of this House, of the third of the same month, "to consider and report on the expediency of repealing an act, entitled 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States'"—being called for:

Mr. S. SMITH said the subject was important, and there was not time at this late period of the session to give it a full and fair consideration. Impressed with the necessity of attending to other public business that must be transacted, he had been induced to give up the consideration, during the present session, of a subject of great importance, (alluding to the repeal of the discriminating and countervailing duties,) and which he had been extremely anxious to have discussed. If the House purposed to go through business then before them, absolutely necessary for the public service, they must forego a discussion that would inevitably consume much time. He therefore moved a postponement of the consideration of the report to the first Tuesday in November.

Mr. MITCHILL hoped the consideration of the report would be postponed. Being opposed to the repeal of the system of bankruptcy, he had, on a former day, moved a postponement to a day which had passed over without the subject being taken up. From its not having been called up on that day, he had supposed that gentlemen did not mean to urge a decision this session. The bankrupt system he considered as a great experiment in the commercial and political world, which Congress had determined to try for five years, when the law will expire by its own limitation. He hoped, as three years had elapsed, it would be suffered to continue till the period of its limitation, when, from an experience of its effects, they would be better enabled to decide on the propriety of perpetuating it. Should the subject, however, be taken up, he was prepared, while he voted against a repeal of the law, to offer certain amendments, which, after a mature consideration of the subject, he considered necessary. He concluded by observing that this discussion would unavoidably take much time, and more he apprehended than the public good would admit, as he was persuaded that even if a majority were in favor of a repeal, it could not be effected without a warm struggle with its friends.

Mr. EUSTIS hoped the motion of postponement would not prevail. The bankrupt law was extremely defective and required amendment. A committee had been appointed to amend it. Their proceedings had been paralyzed by a motion to repeal; and they had abandoned all idea of reporting until a decision was had on this motion. He hoped therefore that question would be taken up and decided; and if the consideration required even three days the House could not spend their time to more advantage.

Mr. BAYARD.—If the postponement take place, there will be an end of the report; and it will rest with the next Congress to exercise their discretion in either repealing or amending the system. The postponement will have the same effect this session as a determination not to repeal; and, if the postponement is carried, the select committee will immediately go to work, and can, in a short time, report amendments.

Mr. NEWTON said it was not his wish to take up much of the time of the House. He was in favor of a repeal of the bankrupt law; and he wished the House to go into a Committee of the Whole, as there must be decided the goodness or badness of the law. The gentleman from Delaware alleges the importance of the system to the commercial world. Granted; and therefore the necessity of investigating that system in a Committee of the Whole, where the greater latitude of debate is allowed. But the commercial world is not very anxious on the subject. On the 14th of January he had made a report on the memorial from the merchants of Norfolk; the report had then been postponed for three weeks; and had remained unacted upon ever since, and yet not a single petition had been received in favor of a continuance of the law. We must, therefore, infer that the merchants are willing to leave to us the decision whether it shall or shall not be repealed. Should the House, contrary to his hopes, determine not to repeal the law, he was prepared to offer amendments; one of which would bite at no person declared a bankrupt should be entitled to his commission for twelve months thereafter. Mr. N. concluded by calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VARNUM hoped the motion would not prevail. Gentlemen would recollect that all the benefits conferred by the bankrupt system on the commercial world were so many injuries inflicted on the other parts of the community. Whether the law were repealed or not, there was no doubt that there ought to be amendments to it.

Mr. HASTINGS was against the postponement. He doubted whether the majority of the merchants were in favor of this law. He believed no class of our citizens were more attentive to their interests than the merchants. He believed they considered themselves injured by this law, and, therefore, they did not come forward with petitions against a repeal. He believed there had never been a law which had produced more iniquity and fraud, and he knew of no business before the House more important than a repeal or amendment of it.

Mr. GRISWOLD was in favor of a postponement, which would lay aside the question of repeal, and clear the way for amendments.

Mr. THATCHER said the people were not in the habit of coming forward and dictating to Congress. Their silence, therefore, on this occasion, was no argument of their indifference. He believed the bankrupt law required amendments, which would be made in case the question of repeal, for the fair discussion of which there was not time, were laid aside. He therefore hoped the motion to postpone would prevail.

The yeas and nays were taken on the postponement, and were—yeas 39, nays 39; the SPEAKER declaring himself in the negative, the question of postponement was lost, as follows:

And the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 17.

Ordered, That the committee to whom were referred, on the fourteenth and sixteenth instant, the memorials of sundry aliens, residing in Montgomery county, in the borough and county of Lancaster, and in the city and county of Philadelphia, and State of Pennsylvania, have leave to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. LEIB, from the same committee, reported a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A memorial of sundry aliens, residing in the city of Baltimore, and State of Maryland, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying a revision and amendment of an act of Congress, passed at the last session, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject."

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

An engrossed bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States," and to the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," was read the third time and passed.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitteed, on the sixth ultimo, a report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Peter Charles L'Enfant, and a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing sundry documents relative to the claim of the said Peter Charles L'Enfant, for planning and laying out the City of Washington, in the District of Columbia, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill for continuing in force a law, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes." The bill was reported to the House with an amendment, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled 'An act supplementary to the 'Act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls,' and for the further protection of American seamen,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled 'An act to revive an act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;' to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

IMPORTATION OF CERTAIN PERSONS.

An engrossed bill to prevent the importation of certain persons into certain States, where, by the laws thereof, their admission is prohibited, was read the third time.

And, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 48, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston; John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, James A. Bayard, Phaniel Bishop, Thomas Boude, William Butler, Samuel J. GEORGIA CLAIMS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the following report of a select committee on the Georgia militia claims:

"The Committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War, together with sundry documents respecting claims against the United States to compensation for services performed by certain militia within the State of Georgia, during the years 1793 and 1794, respectfully report:

"That it appears to your committee that the said services were performed under circumstances which render them a just claim to compensation from the Government of the United States, and that said Government hath already gone far in recognising their validity, by settling with and making payment to the contractor who furnished supplies to the said militia, whilst engaged in performing the same services for which they now claim compensation. Your committee, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for the payment of certain militia employed within the State of Georgia, during the years 1793 and 1794, for the defence of said State."

Mr. EARLY.—Mr. Chairman, believing that the claim, which is now the subject of consideration, depends upon facts little understood by the Committee, I must beg their indulgence, while I endeavor, by a recurrence to a train of documents, to explain and establish its justness. It is a claim for services of the most meritorious kind, performed in defence of an exposed part of the Union.

They were performed under circumstances which called for the interposition and aid of the Government itself, and in the exercise of an almost unlimited discretion delegated by the Executive of the United States to the Governor of Georgia.

It will be recollected that, at the period during which these services were performed, the whole frontier of the United States was in a state of alarm. A general confederacy existed between the Indian tribes residing within our territory, the object of which was an union of hostility against the white inhabitants. A regular warfare was carried on in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, by an army under the immediate orders of the Federal Executive. An irregular warfare prevailed between the inhabitants residing in the now State of Tennessee and the Southern tribes; and the people in the State of Georgia were roused to action by the irresistible principles of self-preservation. This State was lined by a frontier nearly four hundred miles in extent, thinly settled, and immediately in the neighborhood of two of the most numerous and warlike nations, whose settlements were strung along its whole length. Actual hostility quickly roused the people of that country to a sense of their situation. The whole frontier was subjected to inroad, thefts, and massacres; and the innocent inhabitant laid himself down to rest at night, under an awful apprehension that, before his eye could meet the morrow's sun, his ears would be assailed by the war-whoop, or the fire of the savage foe.

In this situation of affairs, communication was made by the Governor of Georgia to the Department of War, stating the existing exigencies, and requesting instruction as to the mode of meeting the impending evils. In the month of October, 1792, the Secretary of War writes to the Governor an answer in the following terms:

"If the information which you may receive, shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures for the defence thereof, as may be in your power, and which the occasion may require."

Here, Mr. Chairman, it will be perceived there was given to the Governor of Georgia a complete discretionary power to call into the field such a number of troops as the occasion might render necessary for the defence of the frontiers. He was constituted judge of the occasion, and judge of the extent of the force which that occasion might render expedient. In conformity with the ample powers thus possessed, he called out and employed in defensive protection the militia, whose claims are now under investigation.

The danger to which our settlements were exposed, did not cease. Such was the spirit of hostility which at that period governed the Indian tribes, that, wherever our frontier was left unprotected, there the unfortunate inhabitants became a subject of slaughter. The troops, of course, were retained in service. But, on the 30th of May, 1793, the Secretary of War writes to the Governor of Georgia, directing the force which should in future be destined for the defence of the frontiers, to be reduced to one hundred horse and one hundred foot, in addition to the regular establishment already in that country; prohibiting, at the same time, any offensive operation, and recognising the power of the State authority to call out any adequate force in cases of an actual invasion, or such imminent danger thereof as would not admit of delay. This letter is considered by the present Secretary of War, in his report to Congress, to have counteracted the orders given on the 27th of October, in the preceding year, and to have suspended the exercise of the discretionary power given to the Governor by that letter. So early, however, as the 10th of June following, including a space only of ten days, another letter is written by the Secretary of War, from which it appears that, before the date of his last of the 30th of May, a communication had been made by the Governor of Georgia, but which had arrived at the War Office after the despatch of the 30th of May. This communication from the Governor had given information of new attacks of the Indians, and a continuation of their hostile disposition. And, in the answer from the War Department of the 10th of June the Governor of Georgia is told, that "The State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, the measures taken by your Excellency may be considered as indispensable. You are the judge of the degree of danger, and of its duration, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to exigencies." It is important to remark here, that this letter was written, under full knowledge, on the part of the War Department, of what had been done by the Governor of Georgia, in relation to the force which had been called into the field, and under a further knowledge of the exigency which had given rise to the measure. This knowledge was derived from the communication of the Governor of Georgia, just then received. On the 19th day of July, however, a letter was written from the War Department, which is considered by the present Secretary as putting an end to any further discretion on the part of the Governor. The present claim, therefore, so far as favorably reported for, is for services performed by troops called into the field by the Governor of Georgia, in the exercise of that discretionary power given him by the letter of the 27th of October, and taken from him by that of the 19th of July following, allowing a reasonable time for disbanding the troops after the receipt of the same.

Mr. Chairman, there is a leading feature which marks these claims, and to which it is important to direct the attention of the Committee as to a polar star. It is, that they are for services confined exclusively to defensive protection. The discretionary powers vested in the Governor of Georgia were restricted alone by this object. To this object were they all directed. I will not at this time enter into an inquiry as to the soundness or humanity of that policy on the part of the General Government which, with respect to all the Southern frontier, has kept up a steady opposition against offensive operations. But I will observe that the experience of all America has proven that such operations produce, as against Indians, the only effective tranquillity; and that the inhabitants of the Southern frontier have never yet received a satisfactory explanation why this description of operations was so sedulously pursued by the General Government, and at enormous expense, too, in relation to the Northwestern country, but strictly and sternly interdicted as to themselves. We, Mr. Chairman, were tied down to defensive measures. A frontier, four hundred miles in extent, was in all its points exposed to hostile inroad and to the depredations consequent upon savage warfare. It is vain to judge of this by the rules applying to civilized nations. If any gentleman in this Committee shall undertake to do so, he will involve himself in an act of signal injustice. Savages are not in the habit of collecting themselves into one army and uniting their force against any particular point. No, sir. They divide themselves into small parties; they extend themselves along the whole line of frontier; each party watches for its time and its particular place of attack. You never know which point is most in danger, or at what time there is most reason to expect an attack. The whole line of frontier, therefore, is in that imminent danger of invasion, which does not admit of delay, in all Indian warfare; an imminent danger, too, which never ceases to exist so long as a spirit of hostility prevails.

This, Mr. Chairman, was our situation; a situation, the exigencies of which were to be provided for and to be met. To effect this, ample powers were delegated to the Governor of Georgia. He was constituted the judge of the occasion; of the degree of the danger; of the quantum of force; and of the duration of the necessity. He was authorized—nay, directed, to call out any number which the situation of things might require. This authority and this direction he pursued. Four hundred miles of exposed frontier were to be defended. Could this be effected by one hundred horse and one hundred foot? I appeal to the understanding of every gentleman upon this floor, and urge the question, whether such a force was adequate to the exigence? I feel confident of receiving an answer in the negative. What, then, was to be done? Was the Governor of Georgia to stand an idle spectator of the murder of his fellow-citizens, and of the ruin of his country? Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that, notwithstanding the wide discretionary powers with which he was possessed, had he not chosen to take upon himself the responsibility of calling into the field an adequate force, and the Indians had ravaged the country, and laid our towns in ashes, how would he have stood acquitted to his country? How would he have answered for the ruin of our settlements and the carnage of our inhabitants? Give me leave to say, sir, that he would have received the execration of mankind, and would have deserved the death of the scaffold.

All Governments are bound to defend their inhabitants. If it be inconvenient to do so, it is right to compensate those who can yield the wanted protection. In the present case that protection was afforded, not immediately by the Government itself, but by individuals called upon for that purpose by one who, as to that occasion, was the agent of the Government. Is there any proof that he abused the discretion given him? On the contrary, does it not appear that the occasion for his exercise thereof existed in necessity? But, admit he did abuse it; are the soldiers who performed the service, and who were bound to yield obedience, under all the penalties of military law, are they to suffer? Suppose the individual, when ordered out, had refused obedience, would he have escaped punishment? It is known he would not. Is there, then, a principle to be established which will deprive a man of his right to compensation for services which he is not at liberty to refuse to perform? We are told, that the State of Georgia ought to pay them. I answer, no, sir. The obligation to obedience was not to State authority. The penalties to disobedience would not have been inflicted under State authority. All the ties in which the soldier was bound were to the Federal Government. It had constituted an agent in Georgia with full powers. That agent had exercised his powers, and incurred an expenditure. This expenditure must fall upon the principal.

The manner of wording the discretionary powers given to the Governor of Georgia could leave no doubt on the minds of those who engaged in the service, that they would be paid. There is upon the face of the correspondence between the War Department and the Governor of Georgia an implied promise of payment. It is a safe principle to construe the acts of Government in matters of contract by the same rules by which you would construe the acts of individuals. Put, then, the case of an individual, who, at a distance from home, receives information that his house needs repairs; he writes to some one, in whom he reposes confidence, authorizing and requesting him to cause such repairs to be made as, in his opinion, may be necessary; the work is done, and the owner, when informed of the extent and price, refuses payment, under a pretext that the repairs done were greater than necessary; would any tribunal hesitate to compel a payment to the full amount? And shall the magnanimity of the Government refuse to direct itself by the most obvious principles of justice, because it possesses the power of refusal? If the discretion given by the War Department was too great, the blame rests with that department. If the agent of the Government abused the trust reposed with him, the fault is there. In any event, and in every view, the soldier is innocent. Many of the officers who commanded the militia, relying upon the faith of the Government, and confiding in its justice, became responsible for large sums of money for necessary arms and clothing furnished the troops. Distress and embarrassment have been their lot.

There is another view of this subject which is considered by the claimants as being conclusive against the Government. It appears from a recurrence to the documents before the Committee that the agent for supplying the troops in Georgia, (John Habersham,) upon inspecting the letter of October, 1792, was impressed with a belief that the troops called into the field by the Governor were authorized by that letter, and that it became his duty to order the contractors to furnish them with the necessary supplies. That he accordingly did. And it is important in the inquiry to direct the attention of the Committee to the conduct of the Government in relation to that part of the transaction. Two years afterwards, when the Government of the United States had become possessed of complete knowledge as to all the circumstances attendant upon the occasion—had become informed of the number of troops which had been in service, the length of time during which they had served, the degree of necessity which had given rise to the draught—the contractor was paid for all the supplies which had been furnished. I will not say, Mr. Chairman, that the opinion of the agent, when he directed the supplies, is conclusive against the Government. But I will say, sir, that these troops were either in the service of the United States, or they were not in that service. If they were not, the General Government had no right to supply them, or, what is the same thing, pay those who did. What nation ever supplied an army in the service of another Power without a special contract for that purpose? The very act of settling with the contractor was then a complete acknowledgment on the part of the General Government that the troops were in her service. But, it has been alleged by a former Secretary of War, Mr. McHenry, in a report made by him, upon this subject, that the unauthorized act of an agent cannot bind the principal. I grant the position, but say that the subsequent conduct of the principal in the case now under consideration, was an acknowledgment on the part of that principal, that the act of the agent was not unauthorized. For if unauthorized the Government was bound, and, in justice to the community, ought not to have defrayed the expenditure incurred by the agent's order. The doctrine of the honorable Secretary goes in its consequence to impeach the General Government of a high breach of trust, in appropriating a portion of the public fund to improper objects. And as some influence has been created against the claim now before the Committee, by the opinion of that officer, it is fair to observe that a preceding Secretary, at least equal in talents, and considerably superior in knowledge upon military subjects, has given an opinion that these claims ought to be paid. I mean Mr. Pickering. [Here Mr. E. read a document containing Col. Pickering's opinion.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I understand that it has always weighed much in this House in matters of claims to show precedent. Fortunately for those who are now appealing to the justice of the Government, there are precedents strongly in their favor. I allude to the case which arose from services performed by militia in the State of Tennessee. They are distinguished in the documents of this House by the names of White's, Ore's, and Johnson's case. These were services performed, too, in the same year with our own. These, sir,

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Claims of Georgia.

H. OF R.

were the services of offensive operation, carried on in the face of a positive order to the contrary, previously received from the Department of War. I beg the attention of the Committee to this fact. [Here Mr. E. read a statement of the case from the documents of the House, proving that they were cases of offensive operation, and strictly forbidden by the War Department.] And yet, Mr. Chairman, these services have all been paid for, years since, under a conviction, on the part of the Government, that they were rendered necessary by the existing state of things. Will not equal justice be extended to the militia of Georgia? Shall the Councils of America incur the foul charge of partiality? Shall the distant and exposed Southern frontier settlements continue to supplicate the protection of their parent, and continue to meet with a cold repulse? Why, Mr. Chairman, wherefore is it that favor is to be perpetually extended to some and not to others? The people of my country have hoped, sir, that the age of favor had passed by. They have, in time past, been compelled to look on in bitter regret at that policy which led to the expenditure of more than four millions of dollars for the protection of a particular territory; when they were themselves bleeding at every pore, undefended by the Government. But they hope the hour of equal justice has arrived.

It is of the first importance to attach to the Government the militia of the country; they are its bulwark, its natural defence. But this can never be effected unless you possess their confidence. The uncertain situation of the American affairs in relation to foreign nations renders this an object of the first magnitude at the present moment. If hostility is meditated from abroad, let gentlemen recollect at what point the first blow must be made. The very first soldiers who must take the field, will be the men who are now suing for justice for past services. They have once before left their home; they have fought your battles; they have given peace to the country, but they are not paid. They are attached to the Government; but refuse them justice, and I will not pledge myself that they will remain so.

Mr. ELMER spoke in opposition to the claim.

Mr. ELMENDORF was against the report; he called for the reading of the report of the former Secretary of War, which he said was a more complete statement of facts than could be given by any gentleman in the House.

Mr. GREGG did not think it necessary that those lengthy documents should be read. The question must turn upon the point, whether the service was performed under orders from the Executive of the United States.

The question was taken for reading the document and carried—48 in the affirmative.

Mr. MERIWETHER then called for the reading of the report made by the present Secretary of War since the commencement of this session.

After the several reports and documents were read, Mr. THATCHER renewed the debate. He was opposed to the claim.

Mr. EUSTIS went into an examination of the Secretary's report. He thought a part of the claim should be allowed.

Mr. GREGG said that when the subject was before the House on a former day, he was strongly impressed against the claim. Since that time he had paid more attention to it, and was of opinion that a part, if not the whole, was a just claim on the United States.

Mr. ELMENDORF, after investigating the several documents and reports on the subject at some length concluded by observing that he did not think the House would be justified in allowing the claim.

Mr. BACON said he confessed his mind was somewhat bewildered on that subject, and that it was not strange for him to be bewildered. He thought two questions should be settled before this House could ultimately decide. The first question, whether it was a claim from the State of Georgia; the second, whether it was a claim from individuals of the State of Georgia. These questions being determined, the business would be fairly before them. He referred to the observations of some other gentlemen, and to some parts of the report of the Secretary of War. He sat down without expressing his determination as to the validity of the claim.

Mr. S. SMITH examined the report of the Secretary of War, from whence he deduced arguments to prove that the claim was just. He concluded by expressing his decided approbation of it.

Mr. MACON was in favor of the report and claim.

Mr. ELMENDORF again opposed the claim on the ground that the Governor of the State of Georgia was acting contrary to the orders of the General Government.

Mr. RUTLEDGE said he did not know whether from the dormancy in which that subject had remained, or some other cause, he had formerly been against the claim in question. But from an examination of the subject, his mind had been changed; he was convinced that a more just demand on the United States could not be presented.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that some gentlemen had objected to the claim, because the State of Georgia had not been invaded. He knew that it had been invaded; that the inhabitants of the frontiers were driven from their homes, and many others killed; he thought these were strong symptoms of invasion.

Mr. T. MORRIS had but one objection to the claim, and that was, that it had been included in the settlement made by the Commissioners, jointly appointed by the United States and the State of Georgia; he was himself satisfied that the Commissioners themselves considered it as included in the one million two hundred thousand dollars.

The debate was continued by Messrs. NICHOLSON, HOLLAND, VARNUM, HASTINGS, and S. SMITH.

Mr. T. MORRIS moved that the Committee should rise. He said he had been informed that Mr. Gallatin (one of the Commissioners) had himself declared that the claim in question was included in the before-mentioned 1,200,000 dollars which was to be paid to the State of Georgia. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) had just made a contrary assertion. Perhaps the information he had received was not correct; if so, he was very desirous to ascertain it. He had no other objection than that, which, if removed, he should vote in favor of the claim. He believed there were other gentlemen in the same situation. He, therefore, wished the Committee to rise, and obtain leave to sit again, in order that the truth might be ascertained.

The motion was lost.

Mr. EVRIS moved that all the words of the resolution after "1793" be struck out.

Not carried.

The Committee rose and reported the resolution to the House.

A motion was made for an adjournment—not carried.

On motion of Mr. RANDOLPH the House took up the report of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. R. said as the subject was of importance to the United States, and of still more importance to the claimants; and as the House were not ripe for a decision, and different views of the subject presented themselves, at every stage of the debate, he would move to postpone the further consideration till the third Monday in November next, or to any future day of the next session of Congress, that would be in order; wishing at the same time that the object should not be lost, but that it might be introduced at a future session under every advantage, and that a fair and candid investigation might take place. The question was taken, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 31.

[The debate on the report above stated was long and desultory. The ground of support and opposition changing with the variety of speakers. The most correct view of the subject is to be obtained from the report of the Secretary of War.]

FRIDAY, February 18.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill to make Beaufort and Passamaquoddy ports of entry and delivery, to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery, to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of Saint Mary's, to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario, and the appointment of a surveyor at Nanjemoy; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

An engrossed bill for continuing in force a law, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statement of the district tonnage of the United States, on the thirty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and one, together with an explanatory letter of the Register of the Treasury thereon; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred, on the tenth instant the memorial of Tobias Lear, on the 12th of January last, and a letter, and report thereon, from the Secretary of State, of the twenty-fifth of the same month, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill in addition to, and in modification of, the propositions contained in the act, entitled "An act to enable the people of the eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to revive an act, entitled 'An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" was read twice, and, on motion, committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Establishment of the United States:'" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to Mr. VARNUM, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. BUTLER.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the 'Act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls,' and for the further protection of American seamen:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred on the fourth instant, a Message from the President of the United States, and a letter and sundry affidavits transmitted therewith, relative to the official conduct of John Pickering, Judge of the district court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House on Wednesday next.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the twenty-sixth ultimo, a petition of sundry citizens of Georgetown, and its vicinity, in the District of Columbia, have leave to report thereon by bill or bills, or otherwise.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide an additional armament for the protection of the seamen and commerce of the United States," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-seventh ultimo, presented, according to order, a bill to reduce the marine corps of the United States; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Mr. VARNUM, from the committee to whom was this day committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States,'" reported that the committee had directed him to report to the House their agreement to the same.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved instructions to the committee on the bankrupt act to report, by bill or otherwise, such amendments, if any, as they may deem necessary to that act.

Mr. ALSTON moved a postponement of the motion till the first Tuesday of November. He thought they had heard enough about the bankrupt act this session, and he hoped they should for the remainder of the session hear no more about it.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, whether the House did or did not act upon the amendments reported, it would be better to have them reported, that the minds of members, who held seats in the next House, might take them into consideration, and be prepared to act upon them at the ensuing session.

The motion to postpone was carried—yeas 40, nays 39.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS offered the following as an additional rule to the standing rules of the House:

"Resolved, That all motions respecting the priority of business shall be decided without debate."

Ordered to lie on the table.

A petition of Alexander Moultrie, of the State of South Carolina, for himself and others, was presented to the House and read, stating that the petitioners, some time in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, made a purchase of a large tract of territory on the Mississippi river, from the State of Georgia, in fee simple, for which the said State received part payment; that the balance of the purchase money was afterwards, pursuant to the terms of the contract, tendered to the said State of Georgia, which has been refused, and which the purchasers were always willing to pay; that the petitioners instituted a suit in the Supreme Court of the United States, by a bill in equity, for a specific execution of the said contract on the part of Georgia, which has abated in consequence of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, "concerning the suability of States;" and praying that Congress will take the premises into consideration, and grant such relief to the petitioners therein as may be deemed equitable and proper.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee to whom was committed, on the 16th instant, the report of the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act for the amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory;" that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. BAYARD, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Joshua Harvey and others; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. NEWTON called for the order of the day, on the report of the select committee to whom was referred the memorial from sundry merchants of Norfolk. The report declares that it is inexpedient to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. SOUTHARD hoped that a bill respecting the location of military land warrants would be first taken up.

Mr. NEWTON trusted the report would be taken up. He should consider a refusal to take it up now, as a denial to take it up during the session.

Mr. BACON was for taking up business in its regular course, without debate.

Mr. VARNUM was in favor of taking into consideration the bankrupt law.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved a postponement till the first Tuesday in November.

Mr. HASTINGS was against a postponement. The evils under the bankrupt law were very great; and if amendments could be made, they ought to be made immediately.

Mr. S. SMITH was in favor of the motion to postpone, as a discussion of the bankrupt law would consume more time than could be spared.

Mr. GRISWOLD said it was not his intention to put aside all amendments to the present system of bankruptcy. His view, on the contrary, was to put the question of repeal out of the way, that the proper amendments might be made. If the House agreed to his motion, he should then move instructions to the select committee to report such, if any, amendments as they might deem advisable. He thought the principle of the bankrupt law correct; that there were at this time defects under that law, he also believed. He therefore wished it amended.

Mr. NEWTON observed that the select committee had considered it inexpedient to report any amendments before the question of repeal had been decided; as the proposition of amendments would be entirely nugatory in case the House determined to repeal the law. He remarked that notwithstanding the long period for which the bankrupt law had existed in England, still, great doubts existed among the ablest legal characters in that country, whether it was not productive of more evil than good. The evils in this country were undoubtedly very great. But he was averse at that time, on a preliminary question, to go into a debate on the effect of the law. He concluded by calling for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GODDARD said it was not because he was very friendly to the bankrupt law that he was in favor of the motion of postponement. Unless the law could be so amended as to obviate the existing evils, he should vote for its repeal. But he was for postponing the question of repeal, that they might immediately take up the necessary amendments.

Mr. HASTINGS would be in favor of a repeal unless two amendments were made. The one to extend the benefits under the law to all classes of citizens who were indebted beyond a certain sum ; the other, that the property of the bankrupt, or a certain part of it, should be liable to satisfy his debts. As the act now stands, it gives a monopoly of benefit to one class of citizens, and is a kind of usurpation of property. He was against the motion to postpone.

Mr. THATCHER said, as the House at this late period of the session was thin, they ought to be cautious in repealing an act of great importance, when the people were not fully represented. He was in favor of the motion to postpone.

Mr. BAYARD was in favor of the motion. Such a law ought not to be repealed at so late a period of the session. It would be impossible to say the decision was the result of mature deliberation. He had heard a great deal of declamation against this law, from some gentlemen well acquainted with its provisions, and from others who had scarcely read the title of the act. My opinion, said Mr. B., is that the commercial world cannot exist without such an act. Its necessity arises from the nature of trade, and does not belong to other classes of citizens. It is founded on the principle that commerce is built on great credits ; and great credits produce great debts. Owing to the risks arising from these and other circumstances, the most diligent and honorable merchant may be ruined without committing any fault. Not so as to the other classes of citizens ; either the cultivators of the soil, the mechanics, or those who follow a liberal profession. They live on the profits of their labor, not on profits derived from credit. It was, therefore, not necessary for other descriptions of persons to contract extensive debts, or to depend on third persons who may ruin them. If a man, who lives by his personal exertions becomes deeply indebted beyond his ability to pay, it must be owing to fraud, or gross neglect ; owing to fraud, if he contracts debts knowing his inability to pay ; or gross neglect, arising from personal indolence, which prevents him from making those exertions of labor and exercising that industry which would extricate him from embarrassment. In neither of which cases is he entitled to relief. I will ask if this is the case with the merchant. I will ask if either in Europe or in this country, a merchant can carry on extensive business without incurring great debts ? and his property is always at the mercy of the winds and waves, and the fraud or negligence of third persons. It follows, therefore, that however industrious or faithful he may be, he is liable to be ruined. Behold, what a large description of persons are merchants, and how much public wealth and national revenue depend upon their pursuits, and let me then ask whether it is not good policy to accord to them a law that belongs to the nature of the profession they follow ? If gentlemen show us that this law ought to be accorded to other descriptions of persons, I have no objection to extending it to them. But give me leave to say they have their law—the insolvent law. Gentlemen say the person, but not the property, ought to be liberated under the bankrupt law. I believe, however, in some of the States, both person and property are liberated under their insolvent laws. Be this right or wrong, the property of the merchant ought to be liberated, because it is otherwise utterly impossible for him ever to rise from the pressure of great debts ; and without great debts there cannot be great credits. Therefore, as a merchant, you annihilate him without such a law, and you rob society of the benefit derived from his labors. A lawyer may owe ten thousand pounds, and be not the less eloquent ; a mechanic may be in debt without his labors being obstructed—nay, this may be a stimulus to him to exert himself to pay off his debts, which cannot in most cases be considerable, and he may afterwards accumulate property—But a merchant deeply in debt, can never entertain the hope of discharging them. All other classes of citizens not living on credit, and incurring debts of great magnitude, may entertain a reasonable expectation of paying them off ; but no such hope can come to the merchant, both from the magnitude of his debts, and the difficulty, under the pressure of those debts, of making any exertions to relieve himself. These circumstances make a bankrupt law necessary to the merchants. The insolvent law is an ample provision for others.

But there are numerous other advantages of a system of bankruptcy ; some of which I will state, although it is not to be expected that on a question of this incidental kind, I can be prepared to go fully into the subject.

It is necessary that a control should be lodged with the creditor over a debtor whose property is in a state of dilapidation, both to save himself and others from ruin. I know that many gentlemen are in the habit of considering this law as exclusively in favor of debtors ; but this is not correct—for it arms the creditor with a salutary power over the debtor to rescue himself from ruin. Insolvent laws are exclusively for the benefit of the debtor. You may see the debtor under those laws squandering his property, and sinking into an abyss of ruin, without permitting the creditor to interpose. Not so under the bankrupt law. In a variety of cases it is in the power of the creditor to compel the debtor to surrender his property, and partition it among his creditors. The practical benefit of this has been experienced in many cases. There has been one case in Philadelphia, in which, I am credibly informed, $500,000 has been saved. A merchant failed for a million of dollars. Not one farthing was got till a commission of bankruptcy was taken out ; under which ten shillings in the pound had been divided. There was another case, I am informed, in Baltimore, in which $300,000 have been saved. Under the bankrupt law, it is no uncommon thing to have dividends. I will ask if any such thing has ever happened under an insolvent law ?

The law appears to be obnoxious to some persons because the property of the bankrupt is liberated ; but why keep it in thralldom under the bankrupt law, when it is acknowledged that no benefit is derived from the opposite course under the insolvent laws?

I call on gentlemen to show that the situation of society was better under the insolvent, than it now is under the bankrupt law. We must have one or the other. We on our side show the benefits of the bankrupt law—let gentlemen, if they can, show those of the insolvent law. We show that under the bankrupt law, it is in the power of the creditor to save the property of the debtor, which is not the case under the insolvent laws. We show that the bankrupt law is productive of an equitable impartiality, and that it prevents those improper preferences which take place under the insolvent laws, and those frauds to which the creditor is actually exposed. Let gentlemen recollect, that, under the bankrupt law, a debtor cannot get his commission without the consent of two-thirds of his creditors; which restriction prevents him from favoring his creditors. Are any such benefits derived from the insolvent laws? There are States in which, under those laws, the person of the debtor, without an incarceration of his person, on a nominal assessment of his debts, is liberated. In cases of this kind, where is the benefit of the creditor? The debtor never comes forward until he is a ruined man; until the schedule of his property will scarcely pay the expenses attending his insolvency. So desperate are these cases, that I do not remember ever to have heard of a dividend. Thus you forfeit all the advantages, and expose yourself to all the evils of the bankrupt law. In no view which I can take of the subject, can I ever consent to repeal this law. I have heard much of the evils attending its execution, but I have never seen them.

I believe as the United States are one great commercial Republic, it behooves us to have one uniform rule co-extensive with the Union, that the merchant in New Hampshire may know the laws of Georgia. I believe that one great use of the bankrupt system is its exposing landed property to sale for the payment of debts, as it is my conviction that no country can be commercial where land is not answerable for the payment of debts. The exemption of lands from a liability to be sold for the payment of debts, is a remnant of feudal policy, and ought to be consigned to the same tomb with its other trappings. I believe also, that States where lands cannot now be sold, will be benefited by the liability. This exemption is to be found only in countries where the possession of power being hereditary, great inducements exist to lock up the property of the country; and even in some of those countries the lands of merchants are liable to be sold for the payment of their debts. Even in England, where there is so much reason, from the nature of the Government, to fetter property, entailed lands are liable to be sold for the payment of debts. For it has been found that a merchant could obtain an extensive credit, invest his property in land, and set his creditor at defiance, enriching himself and his family at the expense of his creditors. This became an encouragement to contract large debts for the express purpose of investing his money in lands, and thus shutting it up from the reach of his creditor. And, no doubt, the same evil has been felt in all the States where the like cause exists; for this circumstance is well known to merchants who have dealings in such States, and to indemnify themselves for their risk they will require a premium on the sale of their goods.

The gentleman from Virginia has informed us that the bankrupt law has long existed in England, and that to this day it is considered in that country as doubtful whether it has not produced greater injury than benefit. I believe the first bankrupt law in that country was passed in the year 1544, since which it has been uninterruptedly in existence. The commercial world and the British Parliament are satisfied with it. What, then, does it amount to, that a few speculative men in their closets are against it? No nation would have so long suffered its continuance, without experiencing benefit from it. Now, their system, thus matured by the experience of ages, we have adopted with numerous emendations, rendering it more correctly applicable to our own circumstances; and our merchants are satisfied.

But it is said there are defects in the law. No doubt of it. It is impossible for the human mind, where the relations are so infinite, to form a perfect system. The law was originally designed as an experiment; as such it was passed for five years. Now, after having run but for two years, we are about to repeal it. How are its benefits to be ascertained, until the operation of the law is fairly tried? Repeal it now, and you will be soon called upon again to pass it in a crude state. Whereas, if, as the defects of the law appear, you apply the knife or caustic, the probability is that in a few years you will so amend it as to make it universally acceptable. There is great force in the observation that the question of repeal is very different from that involved in the original passage—between the giving it existence at all, and the continuing it after it has gone into effect. I hope at this late period of the session the system will not be abolished. The next Congress will be a more numerous body, and will represent more fully the people, and if it shall then appear to be the sense of the nation to repeal, it can be done.

Mr. BACON said, the gentleman from Delaware appeared to be better acquainted with the interests of professional men and of merchants than with the interest of the cultivators of the soil; he seemed to consider the cultivators of the soil as capable of calculating their income and expenditures to a cent. This was not so. The gentleman was mistaken. Suppose a cultivator sells his farm or his produce to a trader; suppose the trader fails and takes the benefit of the bankrupt law, is not the husbandman left without remedy? It is no uncommon thing for a man to abandon the culture of his land, to get a few goods, open a shop, and live in high style; to incur large debts, from which he is relieved by the bankrupt law; while the husbandman, who trusted him, is ruined, without being permitted to avail himself of such relief. I have known many such instances; and I believe these little ostensible merchants very generally avail themselves of the benefits of the act. It is generally, I believe, these peddlars and shopkeepers that have taken its benefit. If the gentleman were as well acquainted with the landed interest as with that of professional men and merchants, I believe we should have been spared the necessity of listening to much of the learned gentleman's speech. The gentleman asks if the country is in a worse situation now than before the passage of the act? In return, I will call on him to show whether it is in a better situation now than it was then. For these reasons I hope the motion of postponement will not obtain.

Mr. HASTINGS.—The gentleman from Delaware has called upon gentlemen to point out the evils of the bankrupt law. I will point out its evils in Massachusetts, compared with those of the insolvent laws. Under the insolvent laws of that State, if a debtor make oath that he has not property sufficient to pay his debts and prison charges, he is liberated from confinement. But any property which he may afterwards acquire, is liable to be taken to discharge his just debts. Is it so with respect to the bankrupt law? Under the bankrupt law he is discharged from all his debts. Not only so, but he receives a part of his property wherewith to recommence business. Under the insolvent laws, his property remains entire and untouched. Here then is a violation of contract between the creditor and the debtor. A mechanic may fail in consequence of a debt due to him by a merchant who becomes bankrupt. The merchant's property is immediately liberated; but not so with the mechanic. The law is an ex post facto law. Before its passage, the mechanic gave credit to the merchant on the faith of the insolvent law. Is not the contract then dissolved by the bankrupt law? And does not this go to impair the obligation of contracts? Such a law may, perhaps, be necessary and useful in England; but there is a wide difference between the people of America and England. A large proportion of the people of that country is engaged in commercial pursuits; here the great occupation is agriculture. Therefore, the situation of the two countries is not analogous. But I believe that, even in England, the bankrupt law was obtained by commercial influence, and is continued by commercial influence. There the merchant exclusively enjoys the benefit of the act; while the mechanic, the farmer, the lawyer, and the clergyman, must lie in prison unless Parliament pass a general act of liberation.

Our bankrupt law is a transcript of the English law, with certain alterations. Here, in case of fraud, the bankrupt is liable to fine and imprisonment; there, he is punished with death. There, if he is guilty of gross neglect, he is not only refused a commission, but is put into the pillory, and if he is declared a bankrupt a second time, and does not divide fifteen shillings in the pound, his person is liable to arrest. Here, the case is essentially different. Here the expenses are enormous. I have known instances where the property surrendered has not been sufficient to pay them. Six dollars a day are allowed to the commissioners, and if engaged but for a quarter of an hour, each commissioner is entitled to six dollars. The law was meant as an experiment; and the gentleman says, though in operation three years, we have not had experience of its good effects. We certainly have experienced that it is destitute of justice; and I believe, if it is continued longer, it will be to give a legislative sanction to fraud. I have always considered the business well managed under the insolvent laws of the several States; nor have I ever heard of any complaints under that law in Massachusetts. I, therefore, believe it best that the business be left to the regulation of the States. I believe the bankrupt law to be entirely for the benefit of the debtor. I ask, is it for the benefit of the creditor to have his contract dissolved, and the liability of the property of the debtor affected? If it shall be continued, I hope the title will be changed, and that, instead of an act for establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy, it will be called an act for establishing an uniform system of fraud throughout the United States.

Mr. EUSTIS.—If the proposition to repeal be postponed, the committee will be permitted to introduce amendments. I hope, therefore, that the postponement will prevail. The objections to the law are so contradictory, that I am at a loss to decide upon them. The gentleman from Massachusetts has stated a number of objections, and yet, he wishes to embrace, within the system, farmers and mechanics, or, in other words, to extend what he considers an evil. It is, in my opinion, unnecessary to decide the propriety of the principle of dividing the property of a bankrupt among his creditors, and liberating that which he may subsequently acquire from seizure. This principle has already been carried into effect, and, I am bold to say, has been attended with good effects in Massachusetts. What were the previous effects under the insolvent laws of that State? The creditor, who was the most vigilant, or who had the most acute lawyer, attached the whole property of the debtor, which is now divided among the creditors. Then there was a conveyance of all property before the debtor availed himself of the act of insolvency—now such a conveyance is nugatory.

I can name a number of respectable merchants of large capitals, who have been unfortunate, in consequence of the situation of the country, by French and English depredations, who, by availing themselves of the provisions of the bankrupt act, have divided their property, and have afterwards brought into activity their facilities as merchants. Is not this a substantial benefit? The operation of the law is also more just and equal than the insolvent laws.

As to the expenses alluded to, they are reduced one-half by the law of the last session. The wisdom of those who have gone before us, has decided on the benefit of the act, and it has been borne out by events. What the effects of the European peace will be, we have not had time to see; in two years we shall be better able to decide on the utility of the system. The capital of our merchants has not yet found its level. There have been great and precarious voyages adventured upon during the war, and I believe this law will put down easily from their difficulties those who have suffered. It is, therefore, most prudent to let the law expire, if it is to cease by its own limitation.

The evils of this system are less numerous than under the old system; though I know the opinions of the commercial world differ. The penalties of this act are milder than those under the English act; so are all our penalties under other acts, and wisely so. I am sensible there have been abuses under this act, but its having produced more salutary effects, I am in favor of its continuance.

Mr. S. SMITH.—The discussion of this day ought to convince gentlemen that those were in the right who prayed them not to go into it, as it has actually destroyed the doing of any business for this day. Another reason in favor of postponement, is to give legal gentlemen time to turn over their books, and to understand what the bankrupt law really is, and to ascertain whether the objectionable parts to which they refer are in the law or not. For I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HASTINGS,) who has pointed out the exceptionable provisions in the law, will not, on examination, find them.

As already observed, the law is an experiment, intended to be tried for five years. Gentlemen are now for cutting off two years. Is this giving the experiment a fair trial?

I understand this to be the distinction between the bankrupt law and the insolvent law: The insolvent law is made to relieve the debtor from thralldom, and for his benefit alone. The bankrupt law is made for the benefit of the creditor against fraudulent debtors. For this purpose it was passed; and as far as I am acquainted with its effects, they have operated favorably.

What were the effects of the insolvent laws on the creditor? Merchants of large dealings, in the habit of giving their names and receiving that of a friend to endorse their paper, obtained discounts on what were termed accommodation notes; when in tottering circumstances, considering themselves bound to secure those who had lent them their names in preference to their real bona fide creditors, they became false to the latter: that is, they secured those who had lent them their names and nothing else; the whole property went to them, while not a dollar remained for the man who had sold his wheat or his tobacco, or any other article. Against these the door was shut. What was the consequence? A petition came forward from the man thus insolvent, who, in Maryland, is released from his debts, without either a lien on his person or property. In Massachusetts, we are informed, the person, but not the property, is released. And what is the effect of holding any property he may thereafter acquire answerable for his previous debts? You will banish him from the State where such laws exist, to those where they do not exist. While he remains subject to such laws he will be idle. Pardon me for the expression, he will be as a dead horse, that will not work. But he will go where he can again act for himself, with some prospect of rising in the world.

Now, what are the effects, in similar circumstances, under the bankrupt law? Merchants know generally very well when a man is on the totter; especially, when they hear that a man in trade is about to secure his securities, they bring him immediately under the provisions of the bankrupt law; and, thereby, secure the farmer, as well as themselves—for the farmer is at home, and does not know the situation of the merchant indebted to him. But merchant watches merchant, and as soon as a commission is taken a fair dividend of the effects of the bankrupt is made among all his creditors.

In Philadelphia, not long since, a merchant failed for a great sum; the necessary oaths were taken, and he was likely to get off with two or three hundred thousand dollars, which was, however, ultimately secured to his creditors under the bankrupt law. In Maryland, a merchant in great trade failed for a large sum. It is true, the eye of jealousy was for some time fixed upon him. But money to the amount of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, that would otherwise have been lost, was seized hold of by the bankrupt act, and, but for which, the fair creditor's claims would have been defeated. Here, then, is the distinction between the insolvent and the bankrupt law. In the last, there is a fair and honest dividend among the creditors; in the first, all such division is defeated, and the effects of the debtor are secured to his friends before he is declared an insolvent.

But, it is said, the bankrupt law has defects. This is a reason for postponing it until the next session, when the aid of gentlemen, who perceive its defects, can be obtained to remove them. But how remove them? By applying its provisions still further than they now extend? The great objection in England is, that it is extended too far. I will ask gentlemen, who hold this language, whether they wish to extend it to the whole farming interest? If they do so extend it, I will tell them that the farmer will owe them but little obligation. What will be the consequence? That his landed estate, owing to his misfortunes, will be brought before the commissioners and swept away; whereas, as at present, by working his estate, he may, in a few years, liberate it from the liens upon it.

It is asked, if the community has been benefited by this act? I will answer, that the commercial part of the community has been benefited; and this is proved by our not having received a single petition for its repeal from any quarter.

Mr. S. repeated his conviction that the law was made for the benefit of the creditor, and not the debtor. It was time that the debtor might feel obliged by the liberation of his person and property; but the creditor, if he had any feeling of justice, would also be satisfied with this effect. No man of feeling would refuse to give up his debts when his debtor gave up all his property. This, indeed, was the universal practice of merchants. He never knew an instance of the reverse; and they generally went further, and relinquished to the debtor his furniture.

But it seems our law is different from the English law. Gentlemen say our law differs from that, inasmuch as, under the English system, on a second bankruptcy, the person of the bankrupt only is liberated, unless he divide fifteen shillings in the pound; and they affirm this is not the case under our law. If he could prove that this was the case under our law, he hoped he should be able to induce gentlemen to postpone the bill until the next session, that they might, by that time, acquire a better understanding of it. The fifty-seventh section of our law is in the following words: [Here Mr. S. quoted the fifty-seventh section.] Now this is verbatim et literatim the same with the British law. I can, said Mr. S., give no stronger argument for the postponement.

Mr. NEWTON said, I rise with an intention to perform a duty assigned to me. I shall at all times obey with promptitude and with pleasure the call of those whom I have the honor to represent, and my strenuous efforts shall never be wanting to promote their happiness and prosperity.

It is well known to the House that the bankrupt law, the subject now before us, has been submitted to our consideration by a petition from the respectable towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in Virginia, complaining of its partial operation and injurious tendency. This law has attracted public notice, and has in no small degree awakened the fears of all reflecting men. It is supposed to produce effects the reverse of those which were intended. The objections to this law are solid and just.

The mischief it produces is extensive; it is not susceptible of amendments; the only antidote to the poison, is a repeal. This opinion is the result of mature consideration.

Having premised thus much, I hope the House will, at this late hour, excuse me for trespassing on its patience. I have no inclination to go into a tedious discussion of the goodness or badness of the bankrupt law, on a question of postponement. It appears to me to be irregular and unfair to deprive us of that freedom of discussion which can be had only in a Committee of the whole House, on a subject so interesting and so intricate. It is a privilege that will not be denied us.

From the course which the debate has already taken, I am compelled not only to answer the arguments urged by gentlemen in favor of a postponement, but also to offer some arguments to justify a repeal of that law. It has been urged by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) that it is improper for us to attempt a repeal of that law, until the mercantile cities and towns shall have given intimation to us that a repeal is wished for. He has also said that time has not been given for the expression of an opinion.

That gentleman, I am apprehensive, has forgot that, about the 13th of January, I presented a petition complaining, in strong and forcible language, of the partiality of that law; and, also, that, on the same day, a gentleman from Massachusetts

(Mr. VARNUM) moved a resolution, which passed the House, directing the select committee to whom the petition was referred to inquire into the expediency of repealing that law. It cannot be forgotten, either by that gentleman or the House, that the committee, with the utmost despatch, made a report, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order for the thirty-first of January. Business of importance having occupied the attention of the House from the thirty-first, till the day before yesterday, prevented my calling up the report of the select committee before that day.

Permit me, sir, to ask that gentleman whether notoriety of an intended repeal of that law had not been given, and whether sufficient time had not been afforded to obtain, before the present day, an expression of the public sentiment from the most distant parts of the Union, from New Hampshire to Georgia, and from the shores of the Atlantic to those of the Mississippi? I am led to deduce from the premises of the gentleman inferences quite opposite. The silence of the merchants on the subject of the bankrupt law, impresses me with a firm belief that they are anxious to have it struck from our statute book.

If this law had fastened itself on their affections, and was peculiarly endowed with properties and energies successfully to guard against and protect the merchant from the misfortunes and calamities to which that profession is liable, would not the merchants, when they behold the Legislative arm covered with power, and uplifted to strike the fatal blow, supplicate you to stay the meditated stroke, and to spare "this stupendous fabric of human wisdom?"

That class of citizens have a quick sense of injuries, penetration to discern and steadiness to pursue their true and solid interest. When the Legislature expressed an intention of conditionally repealing our laws laying discriminating duties, &c., remonstrance on remonstrance was presented to the House against that measure. The prompt expression of their opinion on the latter subject and their silence on the former, I repeat, is to me confirmation strong of their execration of the bankrupt law.

A further reason in favor of a postponement, urged by gentlemen, is not more solid. It is, that the representation in the next Congress will be the fullest of any we have had, and, of consequence, better qualified to decide on this subject; this is an argument more specious than just. Let me ask gentlemen why they were so rash as to form a bankrupt system? Why did they not look forward with the same confidence to the eighth Congress, and leave to that body the consideration of the question whether it would not be enlightened policy to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States? As the gentlemen themselves have had the courage to act on this subject, I trust this House, equal in numbers and talents, will not shrink from it. The object of gentlemen must be manifest to all; it is to defeat the repeal of the law.

I remain confident that the House will, on this occasion, as it did on a former, decide against a postponement, and in favor of going into Committee of the whole House, on the report of the select committee.

I have endeavored to answer with clearness and precision the reasons urged for a postponement, whether successfully or not, the House must determine. I am now compelled to perform an arduous and difficult task, which will be to show that the operation of the bankrupt law, in defiance of any amendments we can frame, will continue to be partial and immoral; and that it is a system which can never enjoy the affections of the citizens of the United States. The task is certainly difficult, on account of the extent of the subject, and our success doubtful from the partiality which it fostered for the jurisprudence of that country from which it is taken. The petition which I had the honor to present, and which is the groundwork of all our proceedings, in general terms, complains of the partiality of the law, and how incapable its provisions are of preventing the practice of fraud.

The partiality complained of can, in my apprehension, have no other meaning than this, viz: that the provisions of that law are not made to extend to every class and description of citizens. This partiality cannot be remedied. This, sir, is not a mere assertion, nor is it a visionary speculation. This assertion is the result of an attentive and dispassionate examination of the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution gives to Congress power to make "uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." The word "bankruptcies" was borrowed from the British statutes, and, as a legal phrase, its meaning is precise and definite. It is well understood and defined by the English jurists. The term "bankrupt" means a trader, one who obtains his livelihood by buying and selling articles of merchandise, or depends for that livelihood, to a certain degree, on buying and selling articles of merchandise. If this definition of the word is a right one, and I aver it to be so, the words "bankrupt, trader, and merchant," are synonymous; they are convertible terms, meaning one and the same thing. As such the Constitution forbids us, nay, stays our hands from extending the provisions of a bankrupt law, to either the farmer, planter, mechanic, or any class of citizens other than a trader or merchant.

I am conscious that I am addressing myself to an enlightened assembly; to its better judgment I will submit, with all that deference and respect, which worth, talents, and virtue, can inspire. If I am wrong, I solicit them to correct my errors. I likewise behold here professional gentlemen, whose skill in jurisprudence is great and undisputed. I pray those gentlemen, if I have deviated from legal ground, to point out the path by which I shall regain it, and I will retrace my steps.

The silence of gentlemen imboldens me to say, that the ground I have taken is firm and solid. Should gentlemen tell me that the British bankrupt system is extended to a description of persons other than traders or merchants, I will grant it. What will be gained by this concession? Nothing, that I apprehend. It is to be remembered, that the Parliament of Great Britain is omnipotent, according to the learned Blackstone. Its power to legislate is coextensive with all and every description of actions which are susceptible of Legislative control, on which the Legislative will can be brought to act. But, even there, if it is the will of Parliament to extend the benefits of the bankrupt laws to other persons, besides merchants, the law must specially describe them. In this country we are so peculiarly happy as to have a Constitution, which is a grant of certain powers; in other words, a code of laws to the governors. All our acts, not authorized and warranted by that instrument, are not binding.

This doctrine is so universally known and understood, that I am relieved from the necessity of adducing instances. The power given by the Constitution to Congress, to make uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, is a limited power, as I have fully shown, in the former part of my argument.

Congress can by no Constitutional law place the farmer, planter, or mechanic, on the same footing with the trader or merchant. The bankrupt law, according to the terms of the petition, is of consequence partial; and, I will add, impolitic and immoral.

I am not disposed, sir, to depreciate the laws and institutions of other nations, nor to detract from their merits; if in their jurisprudence anything valuable is discoverable, and by the adoption of which advantage is to be gained, I shall be ready to render my homage to truth, and to profit by the lessons of experience. Knowledge and wisdom are not the precious and invaluable gifts of Heaven to any favorite clime, or to any chosen people; they are not confined within certain geographical limits, ideal boundaries; they possess the attribute of ubiquity; there is no portion of the globe in which monuments of them are not preserved; and, happy for mankind, they are the splendid and solid acquisitions of study and reflection. Sir, impressions such as these cannot induce me to believe that it is the true policy of any nation to adopt the laws of another without mature consideration, and a firm conviction that the genius and spirit of the laws are in harmony with the genius and spirit of the people, to whom they are to be rules of action. Different states of society require different laws; our political institutions differ essentially from those of the European world.

The European and American think differently on political subjects; to ascertain this, I pray gentlemen to take in one hand the political institutions of Europe, and in the other those of the States and United States of America, and dispassionately compare them with each other. If I mistake not, the stature and features (if I may be allowed the expression) of the human mind will be found, as there delineated and depicted, to preserve no striking likeness. Our Constitution and laws are laid on the solid foundations of equality of rights, and equality of condition. Laws which make and countenance distinctions between citizen and citizen, are hostile to the nature and well-being of our Governments. If we are desirous of perpetuating the existence, and I trust we all are, of the Constitution of the United States, and those of the respective States; our laws, emanating from these different sources, should act in unison and concert, or as nearly so as the nature of things will admit; uniformity will give to them strength; and, erected as they would be, on the stable foundation of equal and immutable justice, they would forever possess the affections of the people. Should a contrary course be pursued, our political institutions, the admiration of the world, the first-born of Wisdom, would receive a shock that would make us all tremble for their preservation. Prior to the formation of the present Constitution, the State governments had, within their respective jurisdictions, the regulation of all matters relative to property, contracts, &c.; in a word, all civil and criminal jurisdiction. All transactions, even to this day, between citizen and citizen, except in certain specified cases, are under the immediate control of State laws. It has ever been the policy of most of the States, and with confidence I speak of the State of Virginia, not to impair the obligation of contracts, nor to absolve a man from his debts. The only release from a debt or contract is to pay the one and perform the other. To protect the debtor from the oppression of the creditor—to which, in some countries, the creditor can at will subject the debtor—insolvent laws are in force, by the provisions of which the debtor can liberate his body from imprisonment, by assigning over his estate, both real and personal, for the benefit of the creditor. A debtor who has taken the benefit of the insolvent law cannot be imprisoned again by the creditor for the same debt, though the property given up by him is insufficient to pay the debt of the creditor. The subsequent acquisitions of the debtor are made liable to pay the balance. The laws are uniform, consistent, and just; they bear with equal authority upon all and every description of citizen—high and low, rich and poor. This evident impartiality has endeared the State laws to their affections. Our common standard of justice is established; the result is obedience, without murmur, to the laws, and a perfect acquiescence in their commands.

The bankrupt law, which is now under consideration, is of a different complexion. It is partial in the extreme, it operates exclusively in favor of the merchant and trader, and in contradiction to the genius and spirit of the laws of the States, absolves the trader from the fulfilment of his contract and from the payment of his debts. Is this moral? It is, however, the evident tendency of the bankrupt law. If a merchant or trader is indebted to the farmer, planter, or mechanic, and become a bankrupt, and obtains his certificate of discharge, though his property will not yield a shilling in the pound, he is everlastingly absolved from paying the balance. If, after this, he becomes as rich as Cæsar, the laws cannot coerce a payment; the debtor may enjoy all the luxuries of life, while the unfortunate creditor, poor indeed for the want of this balance—Lazarus like—may be denied a crumb from his table. Reverse the case, suppose the farmer, planter, or mechanic, to be indebted to the merchant, that his person is imprisoned for the debt; that he obtains his discharge, by the insolvent law, from confinement by giving up his property, but which is insufficient to pay the debt. Is he compellable in law to pay the balance? Yes, the obligation to pay it remains in force. His future acquisitions, obtained by the sweat of his brow, are mortgaged to pay up the last shilling. Is this discrimination just? Our minds, accustomed and familiarized to contemplate with pleasure the equal justice of the State laws, revolt at and abhor the partiality and wickedness of this bankrupt law. To reconcile us to this law, gentlemen (Messrs. BAYARD and SMITH) tell us that merchants are at the sport of winds and waves, and that they are more liable to accidents, misfortunes, and casualties, than other men.

Sir, we are all, whatever may be our professions, but passengers through life; the tempest beats on us all with equal fury; and the iron rod of adversity makes no exceptions of persons, from the palace to the cottage. The storm that strands a bark or sinks it into the fathomless deep, may in its sweep prostrate and destroy the fairest prospects of the farmer. If it is our object to be successfully guarded and protected against the hazards and perils to which we are daily exposed, the armor of prudence should never be taken off. In that, and that only, have we any security; it is the ægis, without which we perish. This brings me to a very interesting part of my subject.

I shall be brief. I hold it, sir, to be a truth that cannot be denied, that that law which weakens the control of prudence over human actions and concerns, stabs in its vitals a cardinal virtue, and leaves society exposed to the incursions and ravages of every vice. I am fully persuaded that merchants suffer greater losses from the imprudence of those with whom they have extensive dealings than from all the perils and dangers of the sea, or the precariousness of foreign or domestic markets.

When a man discovers that he can rid himself of the importunity and demand of his creditors by a bankrupt law, he is too apt to enter into engagements without regard to the means which will enable him to comply with them, and he will likewise be too prone to extend his speculations and projects incautiously beyond his capital. I make these remarks because I think they delineate with force the evils of the bankrupt law, and from a solicitude I shall ever feel to protect the circumspect and prudent merchant from the wild and visionary projects of the imprudent and incautious trader. Should we be told that a certificate of discharge is obtained with difficulty, and that the bankrupt must produce the clearest evidence that his failure was the consequence of unavoidable accidents, of real and not frivolous misfortunes—the answer is plain and concise. In that country in which bankrupt laws are best understood, and have undergone revision after revision. they have disappointed in practice the sanguine expectations of their greatest admirers. Every expectation has been tried to prevent the practice of frauds. Streaked, if I may be permitted the expression, as the British statutes are, with blood, and, if I mistake not, those of France and Spain are not less severe in their penalties, yet frauds are practised successfully.

Can gentlemen imagine we shall succeed better in this country? Vain, indeed, will be their calculations. The little experience we have gives us nothing to hope, but much to fear. It is a maxim of the common law, and which has long been adopted by the respective States, that no man can be made to accuse himself. Yet this law compels an examination of the bankrupt on oath as to the amount of property, and whatever relates to his mercantile transactions.

If, sir, the bankrupt has committed fraud, he is forced to confess it, and to submit to the punishment of the law, or to deny it, and escape, if possible, the punishment by the commission of perjury. To what a dilemma may the innocent but unfortunate bankrupt be reduced. Misfortunes unnerve the mind, his recollection fails him, his faculties are disordered and disturbed, and ruin and wretchedness stare him in the face. In such a situation, he is put upon interrogatories; if his answers are contradictory, and no wonder they should be so, for it is the peculiar felicity of but few, in time of difficulty and danger, to be self-collected, composed, and serene, when suspicions of fraud are entertained; and should a further examination into his affairs, discover that he had not fully disposed of all his property, nor given an accurate history of all his transactions, he is deemed guilty of fraud; facts and circumstances are against him, his innocence avails him nothing, and he is doomed to feel the vengeance of the law. Injuries and insults are added to misfortunes. I call upon the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD,) the champion of the common law, to tell us how he can reconcile to himself this departure from the mild and humane principles of his favorite system? How he can justify, in contradiction to that law, to make the wife a witness against her husband?

This law, sir, outrages every feeling of humanity, and tramples down every principle and maxim of jurisprudence which time and reason have approved and consecrated. This law violates and profanes the sanctuary of love and friendship, and tears the disconsolate wife from the bosom of her husband to bear testimony against him; her feelings, affections, and duties, relatively to herself and to her husband, are at the shock and mercy of a law that would disgrace an inquisition. If her husband, goaded by the stings of adversity, should deviate from moral principles, to what a situation do you reduce the innocent companion of his misfortunes? If she testifies to the fact, her husband is condemned to ten years imprisonment, is consigned to the damp, fœtid, and unwholesome cell of a jail, shut up from the world, and perhaps from her! I tremble at the alternative; I tremble in beholding her in a crisis that would humble and dismay the boldest among us.

Shall I go on? The recording angel as he wrote it down, would drop a tear, and blot it out forever! I will conclude, with remarking, that I am not only in favor of a repeal, for the reasons already assigned, but other reasons, which, for want of time, I shall barely mention: 1st. Because the insolvent laws of the States are better calculated to attain the end proposed by this law, and because they are equal in their operation. 2d. Because the law, in my opinion, is in principle anti-Republican; distinctions being made between citizen and citizen in the dispensation of justice. 3d. Because I believe it to be policy not to carry all our Constitutional powers into operation, and because I entertain an opinion that were those virtuous patriots, and enlightened statesmen who framed the Constitution to pass it at this day in review, their practical knowledge of the innate viciousness of bankrupt laws would cause them to strike from the list of Congressional powers, that which authorizes the making of bankrupt laws. 4th. Because we have all along prospered without such laws.

I fear, sir, my remarks, as I have been unexpectedly forced from the course which business of importance usually takes, have been desultory. I trust the House is now fully convinced of the necessity of resolving itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the select committee. I therefore hope the postponement will not be agreed to.

Mr. DANA said he had but a few arguments to advance, as the subject had already been discussed with learning and ability. He acknowledged that, in the course of the debate, he had been instructed by information of which he was not previously aware. Most of the objections urged against the bankrupt system affected more the principle on which it was founded than its details. A distinction has been drawn between the authority under which this law is passed, and that of other laws in relation to persons insolvent. Taking the distinction laid down by the gentleman from Virginia as correct, and it follows that the Constitution has decided the soundness of the principle of the bankrupt law, by not giving us the power of creating an insolvent law, except where individuals are in confinement under laws of the United States. The Constitution, therefore, having decided this point, has superseded the necessity of all discussion of it here. As to the particular objections made to the law, amendments may remove them. If the district judge shall be empowered to revise and disallow, in case he sees fit, the proceedings of the commissioners; that is, possess the ultimate right of deciding on the whole business, many of the existing objections will be removed. He wished it so amended, believing the general principle, on which it was founded, sound.

Mr. BAYARD said there was not time, nor would the House have sufficient patience to enable him to comply fully with the call of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. HASTINGS.) But as he had received a call from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NEWTON,) to answer which will not require so much time, he could not resist the civility of a reply. That honorable gentleman has called upon me, as the champion of the common law, to reconcile what to him appear as inconsistencies, with that system certain parts of the bankrupt act. I ought, (said Mr. B.,) to return thanks to that gentleman for calling me the champion of the common law. If I believe anything, I believe that that law is the source of all the rights and liberties of my country. I believe that it is owing to that law that we now hold so proud a superiority to England, France, and other nations. Give me leave to say there is not a State in the Union that has not adopted it; and where it does not form a part of the code of laws under which criminal and civil jurisprudence is administered.

The honorable gentleman has told us that, under the common law, a wife cannot be examined in cases where her husband is concerned; and he contends that, under the bankrupt law a contrary practice is authorized. It is true that, under the common law, a wife cannot be examined either to condemn or acquit her husband. But if the gentleman had gone further, he would have found nothing anomalous in the provisions of the common law, and those of the bankrupt law. He would have found that the latter does not allow a house to be divided against itself; one half to be examined, and the other not. The common law does not allow a man to be examined against himself; but the bankrupt act does, and also allows a wife to be examined. It follows, therefore, that the indivisibility of man and wife is not affected.

I am astonished that gentlemen should oppose this law on principles so opposite and contradictory that they destroy each other. Some gentlemen complain of its rigor, while others condemn it for its laxity. How are both these descriptions of gentlemen to be pleased? I believe a proper medium between these extremes is best. With regard to the objection urged against the severity with which the law punishes fraud, and which has so strongly excited the sensibility of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. NEWTON,) it is incorrect. On this subject the gentleman is mistaken. He has told us that a perturbed merchant, if involved in mere mistake, is liable to lose his life, or be imprisoned for ten years. But he is radically mistaken. In England, France, and Holland, there is no punishment inflicted without intentional fraud. It is not so here, and, indeed, I am confident, nowhere else. Yet we are told that an unfortunate debtor who unfortunately attempts to defraud his creditors, may have the misfortune to be punished. Gentlemen might as well say that, owing to the unfortunate cupidity of the midnight thief who broke into a house and despoiled its tenant of his property, or, owing to the frailty of the still more unfortunate man who ravished his neighbor's daughter, he ought not to be punished. How is the fact under this law? Deliberate fraud, and that only, is punished.

The gentleman from Virginia says this law is anti-republican in its nature and tendency. If so, I am as ready to repeal it as himself; as I believe I am as much attached to republicanism as he is. But how is it anti-republican? Because, it is said, it operates more upon one class of citizens than upon another. If this circumstance makes it anti-republican, there is not a law in existence that is not anti-republican; there is not a law which we have passed, or can pass, that does not at one time operate more upon one class than another. What was the operation of the tax upon stills, stamps, and a thousand other articles? Yet among all the objections to those laws, I never heard this raised as an objection. If any man consider it anti-republican and unequal, he has only to make himself a trader, and it at once becomes to him republican and equal. But so far was this objection from arising in my mind as possible, that I was about to urge the opposite argument, and to recommend the law to the approbation of one side of the House on the principle of its being republican in its nature and operation, and which I sincerely think ought to recommend it to both sides. It is republican, because it is equal in its effects; it divides the property of the debtor equally among his creditors; and republicanism is founded upon equality. It is not only republican, but, moreover, it is equitable.

I have already gone further than I intended. Gentlemen who have spoken having gone very wide from the question before the House, I found it necessary, in some measure, to follow them. If the subject is postponed, further remarks will be unnecessary; and, if another decision shall prevail, it will then be in order to make them.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on Mr. GRISWOLD's motion, to postpone the subject until the next session, and carried—yeas 50, nays 39, as follows:

SATURDAY, February 19.

Mr. DAWSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning the salt springs on the waters of Wabash river; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the 11th of December last, the petition of James Dohertie and others, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said petition be referred to the committee appointed the 16th instant, on the report of the Commissioners under the "Act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory;" that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Remonstrances and petitions of sundry inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania, west of the Alleghany Mountain, were presented to the House and read, respectfully stating the inconveniences to which they have been and are now subjected, in consequence of the shutting of the port of New Orleans, in virtue of a proclamation of the Spanish Intendant of the said port, without having a place of deposit assigned to them on the Mississippi river; and praying that Congress will take the premises into consideration, and adopt such measures for redress therein as, in their wisdom, may be deemed most effectual and proper.

Ordered, That the said remonstrances and petitions be referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was referred, on the 16th instant, the report of the Commissioners appointed in pursuance of an act, entitled "An act for an amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, and authorizing the establishment of a government in the Mississippi Territory," have leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee last mentioned, reported a bill regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill for settling sundry claims to public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the insurance of buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the bill with two amendments, which were, severally, twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and three; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the bill with several amendments thereto; which were, severally, twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to incorporate the Directors of the Columbian Library Company; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LEIB called for the bill to amend the naturalization act; on which the House went into Committee of the Whole.

The bill exempts those aliens who came into the United States between June, 1798, and April, 1802, from the obligation of declaring their intention to become citizens.

Mr. BAYARD spoke against and Mr. S. SMITH in favor of the bill.

Mr. GODDARD, being adverse to the bill, moved that the Committee should rise, in order to dismiss them from any further consideration of it.

This motion was supported by Messrs. BAYARD and THATCHER, and opposed by Messrs. S. SMITH, LEIB, and SMILIE; and was lost—ayes 30, noes 43.

The Committee then reported the bill, and the House ordered it to a third reading on Monday.

TENNESSEE LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the claimants to lands of the United States lying south of the river Ohio, State of Tennessee, under an Act of the State of Georgia, passed on the 7th day of January, in the year 1795, be heard by counsel at the bar of this House on Tuesday next."

Mr. NICHOLSON observed that he believed any man had a right to be heard upon any subject on which he thought himself aggrieved. He imagined it would save time if they were admitted to the bar of the House. If that measure was not adopted, they must be heard before the select committee, who would have to report, whereas by the method then proposed, the subject would come immediately before the House. The claimants were not satisfied with the report of the Commissioners. The reasons on which that disagreement was founded they desired to state to the House, believing that such facts might be produced as would have weight in their decisions.

Mr. BAYARD thought the request so reasonable, that any remark was unnecessary to induce a compliance with it on the part of the House. It was an ancient maxim, he believed having the authority of Seneca, "that the judge who decided, having heard only one party, judged iniquitously, though he happened to judge rightly." As the representatives of the nation, they were bound in honor to hear them. There was a wide difference between the claimants and the Commissioners, he believed, because the latter considered the conveyance not an equitable grant. Whether it was or was not an equitable grant, in order to prevent further trouble in settling this land, and as it was a matter of great expectation to the claimants, who constituted a respectable portion of the citizens of the United States, he was of opinion that the House should not refuse this request.

Mr. BACON was in favor of the resolution.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed his embarrassment on the occasion; he did not wish to oppose the resolution, nor did he think the House had time to hear them the present session. If the House should refuse to hear them, it would not decide their case—they could then resort to a court of justice. They would not accept the offer of the Commissioners, because they thought their chance greater at a law suit. He thought they were no more bound to those people (the claimants) than any others who had a law suit. He should be glad to hear them if they had leisure. But they (the House) were not to be the judges; if a compromise was not to be effected, they would finally resort to a court of justice.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, the object of the law appointing Commissioners to act on that subject was, to make a compromise if possible. What was the situation of these people? They had, by passing that act, brought the claimants from all parts of the Union, at a great expense, the Commissioners had reported, and now could they with any propriety refuse to go any further? He thought they were bound, by principles of justice, to hear them. He hoped the question would be immediately decided. He believed, also, with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) that it would be a saving of time.

Mr. RANDOLPH was sorry to come under the censure of the gentleman from Connecticut. He was not opposed to hearing them, but was in doubt whether they could hear them at any time, without omitting other business which was absolutely necessary to be done at this session. If counsel were admitted, they might speak till 12 o'clock at night on the 3d day of March, to the neglect of business on which the safety of the United States depended. Besides, there was no violation of justice—they still had their resort to a court of justice.

Mr. BACON said, the conclusion of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) not to hear these claimants, was not conducting business in a manner becoming the dignity of that House. He was not afraid of their trespassing on the patience of the House; we wanted no better security against that than their own interest. He hoped the resolution would obtain, and that it would be decided immediately.

The question on the resolution was carried in the affirmative—45 voting in favor of it.

MONDAY, February 21.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom were referred, during the present session, the several memorials and petitions of the "Franklin Association," and of other journeymen printers, of sundry comb-makers, gunsmiths, corkcutters, calico-printers, cordwainers, papermakers and letter founders; of sundry manufacturers of umbrellas, brushes, stone-ware, gunpowder, hats, and starch, within the United States; praying for protecting duties to be laid on the importation of articles used in their respective manufactures, made a report thereon; which was read and considered: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to prepare and lay before Congress, early in their next session, a plan for the levying new and more specific duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, so as that the same shall, as near as may be, neither increase nor diminish the present revenue arising to the United States from imports.

The bill to incorporate the Directors of the Columbian Library Company, which was received and ordered to lie on the table, on the nineteenth instant, was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

An engrossed bill making an appropriation for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and three, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill concerning the insurance of buildings, goods, and furniture, in the county of Alexandria, in the Territory of Columbia, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS called up his resolution, making it a standing rule of the House that all questions, respecting priority of business, should be decided without debate.—Carried without a division.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the amendments of the Senate to the bill providing an additional armament for the protection of commerce and seamen of the United States.

The Senate propose a new section, authorizing the President to build a number of gunboats, not exceeding fifteen, and appropriating fifty thousand dollars therefor.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved the recommitment of the bill to a select committee.—Lost, ayes 17.

The amendment of the Senate was then agreed to.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making an appropriation for the support of Government for the year 1803. The several blanks were filled and the bill reported agreed to in the House, and ordered to a third reading to-morrow. Among the appropriations of the bill is one of between three and four thousand dollars for completing the jail in the City of Washington.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on a bill in addition to, and modification of, the propositions contained in an act admitting the Northwestern Territory into the Union.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Military Land Warrants—Naturalization.

H. of R.

The House took up the report of the Committee, concurred, and ordered the bill to a third reading to-morrow.

MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

The House took into consideration the bill extending the time for the location of military land warrants, &c.

Mr. DAWSON.—Some days ago I moved a postponement of the consideration of that report. This did not arise from any disposition unfriendly to it, or objections to its provisions. In my judgment they ought to be extended; for I hold it to be our duty, and it ought to be our pride to render justice by every means in our power to those who rendered service to us during our Revolutionary war; and, I am happy to observe, that this appears to be the general sentiment of this Legislature. It is known to you, sir, and to every gentleman of this Committee, and I may add, to every citizen of these States, that General Lafayette rendered to us essential services during that period. At the commencement of that war, he entered into the service of the United States, and continued in it until the close, at his own expense and expenditure of his private fortune. Since then, sir, various have been his fortunes. At one time he has been at the head of a great nation; at another buried in the dungeons of a despot. At that moment, Congress, feeling for his misfortunes, and remembering his services, passed a law granting him, in specie, the amount of his certificates. This act, sir, relieved his distresses, and was nothing more than justice on our part.

Having entered into our service as a Major General, never having been attached to any particular line, he never has received any land as other officers did. His fortunes are now much reduced, and I am persuaded that I do an act beneficial to him, and honorable to my country, by offering to you the following amendment, which, I trust, the wishes of every gentleman of the Committee have anticipated.

[Here Mr. D. read a new section, allowing General Lafayette a quantity of land equal to that allowed to officers of a similar rank.]

I will only observe that I have placed General Lafayette on the Virginia Establishment because the quantity of land will be greater, because in that State he rendered most of his services, and was generally attached to that line.

Mr. T. MORRIS hoped a decision would not then be pressed, as there was scarcely a quorum in the House. He did not know whether he should finally vote for or against it; or whether he should not move to extend the provision to other officers. He, therefore, moved an adjournment; which was carried—ayes 30.

NATURALIZATION.

The bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization," &c., was read a third time.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any alien, being a free white person, who was residing within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States at any time between the eighteenth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and the fourteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and two, and who has continued to reside within the same, may be admitted to become a citizen of the United States, or any of them, without a compliance with the first condition specified in the first section of the act, entitled "An act to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject."

The question was put on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GODDARD observed that, at this late period of the session, when almost every gentleman who spoke complained of the want of time to complete the public business, he was not a little surprised to find this bill, from day to day, pressed upon the House. He thought there were no persons less entitled to occupy the time of the House at this period than these petitioners. He therefore moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in November next. He was induced to make this motion not only because the time of the House was wanted for other and more important business, but from the circumstances under which the petitions upon which the bill was founded had been introduced into the House. They were at first expressed in language so indecent that the House refused to act upon them, or even to commit them. Only two days after, they were presented again with the same signatures and in the same words, with the exception of one passage, which was thought most improper. It was impossible that the petitions should have been sent back to the subscribers, at a distance of several hundred miles, and again returned to the House. He presumed, therefore, that some person had taken the liberty of new modelling the memorial and of presenting it in the names of persons who had never seen it in its present form. If there were no other argument against passing the bill, this would be sufficient with him. He thought the petition ought to be sent back to the subscribers, and they ought to be informed that the House had refused to act upon it on account of the improper form in which it appeared. But if the bill should now be passed, the greater part of them would never know that any objection had been made to the liberties which they took with the Government and the House. They would merely know that their request had been promptly complied with.

Mr. DANA took a review of what had been done for the petitioners at the last session of Congress. He mentioned various important subjects which had lately been postponed for want of time to act upon them. These petitions, he remarked, had been introduced since the subject of discriminating duties—a subject recommended to the consideration of the Legislature by the President of the United States himself—had been postponed professedly for want of time. The subject of amending the bankrupt law, which was considered as very important to the United States, had been postponed for the same reason. A number of pressing petitions from our own citizens had been disposed of in the same way and on the same grounds. He thought, therefore, that unless these aliens were entitled to more attention than any description of our own citizens, and even than the President of the United States himself, the House could not consistently act upon those petitions at the present session.

Mr. SMILIE.—This bill is objected to on two grounds: first, that there is not time to consider it, and, secondly, from the phraseology of the petitions. But the remarks of gentlemen cannot apply to the language contained in the first petitions, as they were not committed, and as the present bill is founded on other petitions, in which the exceptionable language is not to be found. I therefore know no reason for mentioning the first petitions, on which no order has been taken. I hope, however, since they have been brought up, that I may be indulged in a few remarks, to examine whether they are so objectionable as has been contended.

Mr. NICHOLSON inquired whether such remarks were in order.

Mr. SMILIE said those petitions had been alluded to in debate, and he was only replying to the remarks made. He then read the following part of the petitions:

"That your memorialists submit the circumstances under which those of them residing here from the Summer of 1798 until the Spring of 1801 were placed. Every alien, distinguished for his attachment to the principles of liberty, was incessantly abused in the papers countenanced by the Administration then in power. The American Minister at St. James notified, in the name of Government, that the Irish state prisoners would not be permitted to reside in this country; and the British Government made this the pretext for detaining them in dungeons, for the space of four years, in open violation of solemn compact. The Presidency was then in the hands of a man notoriously hostile to aliens of republican principles; and the President was authorized by law to banish any alien at his pleasure, without trial, and without appeal. Under these circumstances your candor will allow that an alien resident could have no inducement to declare his intention of becoming a citizen; for, by so doing, he placed his name on a list of proscription, and subjected himself to the arbitrary will of an individual."

This, said Mr. S., is the obnoxious paragraph. I have said before, and now repeat it, every word is true. I allow that telling the truth is sometimes disagreeable, and this may be one of those cases, but I could never despise the man who speaks the truth. The petitioners first say, "that every alien, distinguished for his attachment to the principles of liberty, was incessantly abused in the papers countenanced by the Administration then in power." On this point, I need say nothing, as every gentleman here must be sensible of its truth. In the second place, they say the President was not friendly to aliens. This is true, or he would not have signed the bill, in the face of the Constitution, to put into his power every alien in the United States. In the third place, it is stated that the American Minister interfered and prevented them from coming to this country. A passage which I shall read from the letter of the Minister will show whether this is true or not. [Mr. S. here read the following extract from a letter of Mr. King to one of the Irish State prisoners:]

"You must be sensible that I possess no sufficient means of forming an opinion respecting your sentiments; but the motives which lead me to interfere with your Government, to retain the emigration of the persons above alluded to, oblige me to observe a due caution on the present occasion."

After hearing this language, I think the House will not be disposed to think the language of the petitioners too plain. I do not believe the President or the Minister was authorized to interfere in such cases. I know of no law authorizing such conduct. I do know of a law which authorized the President to banish aliens, but I do not know of any law which authorized him to prevent emigration. The alien law authorizes the President "to order all such aliens as he shall judge dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States, or shall have reasonable grounds to suspect are concerned in any treasonable or secret machinations against the Government thereof, to depart out of the territory of the United States." This is a memorable law! Now, what does the Constitution say of the rights of all men in this country? Hear:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein such crime shall have been committed; which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation, to be confronted with the witnesses against him, to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

Compare this Constitutional declaration with the character of the alien law. Remember that the Constitutional provision is not confined to citizens; the words are, "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused," &c. By the alien law, all aliens are placed at the mercy of the President; they are not convicted on an impartial jury trial; they are not even tried by the President himself; but, on mere suspicion, are banished from the country! This is the state in which all aliens were placed by this law. When under these circumstances, I say, it is not extraordinary that they should come forward and express their opinions. Is this an offence? Be this as it may, the present bill does not originate in these petitions, but in others, whose language is unexceptionable. And where is the danger of admitting this description of aliens of five years' residence, when all others are admitted on the same terms, barely because they did not signify their intention to become citizens, when a period of fourteen years' residence was required? A person, before he signifies his intention, must be of age: could, therefore, the age be expected?

I mentioned the other day what, I considered it, a duty which we owe to these people: I will now mention a duty that we owe ourselves. Is not our wealth increased by emigrations? He who brings with him nothing but his person, brings his labor and that, in a country that only requires improve ment to be productive, is considerable. But there are many emigrants who bring positive wealth into the country. But gentlemen are apprehensive lest those foreigners, by interfering in our present political system, will injure or destroy it. This idea has always appeared to me ridiculous. Foreigners, in my opinion, will be soon merged with ourselves, and instead of introducing among us their sentiments, will soon take up ours. This objection has appeared to me, too, the more extraordinary, inasmuch as it is raised against foreigners, not because they are the subjects of monarchs and tyrants, but because they have too high ideas of liberty. Where, then, can be the danger of their coming among us, and, after a reasonable residence, participating in our Government? If I excepted any from exercising this right, it would be from the instruments of tyranny in other countries, and not those who, by their republicanism, have rendered themselves obnoxious to tyrants. But when it is remembered that this bill only applies to a particular class of men, to whom three years are saved, and without which a residence of eight years will be necessary, I do hope that the House will so far indulge us as to pass the bill for the relief of this class of persons; for, however unimportant it may be to the Eastern and Southern States, in the Middle States the mere consideration of labor is of the last importance in improving the value of their land; and I trust that gentlemen, whose constituents cannot be injured by it, will suffer it to go into existence, for the benefit of those States which will derive a great advantage from it.

Mr. BACON observed that the subject had been ably discussed, both in public and private, as well by those who were learned as by those who were unlearned. As every member must be ready to vote upon it, he hoped much time would not be spent in debate.

Mr. DAVIS wished the gentleman from Massachusetts would give them example instead of precept. Had he done so, he would have saved that time the loss of which he deplored. Indisposition having prevented him from attending the House for eight or ten days, he had not had an opportunity of opposing the progress of this bill. He was surprised at the sentiments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) and at the turn which this business had taken. A petition had been presented, and after examination, on account of its insolent language, had been refused to be committed.

Afterwards similar petitions had been presented, which the House were about to treat in the same way; when they were informed that the exceptionable language was not in them. How persons, so distant as the petitioners, could, in a few days, have corrected their petitions and sent on others was most astonishing. Pardon me for saying that the new petitions must have gone to press here, and the names of the petitioners have been transcribed. If so, we are now acting upon forged petitions; and immediate steps ought to be taken to protect us from so gross an imposition, by which the petitioners are represented to hold a different language from that which they meant to express.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has told us that the facts stated in these petitions are true and that the President had authority, under the alien law, to banish all aliens. Will he say why he had this authority? It was given in consequence of their unceasing interference in the affairs of the Government, and in consequence of their restless and rigorous behaviour, that Government thought it necessary to protect themselves from their impertinent interference. The law grew out of these circumstances. The gentleman is now for opening the door still wider to this description of persons who have manifested themselves to be of the most turbulent and factious tempers, and who are constantly employed in disseminating their poison among the people. I verily believe, that, in less than five years from this time, we shall be obliged to re-enact the law for requiring fourteen years residence before citizenship is conferred. I shall not, indeed, be surprised at our soon having a petition from those men to amend the Constitution, and to admit an alien to be President of the United States.

At the request of these petitioners, we are about to infract the Constitution. The Constitution says that Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." At the last session we passed a law on this subject containing four rules. The first rule prescribes that every applicant for admission to citizenship, shall have declared on oath, or affirmation, three years at least before his admission, that it was his intention to become a citizen. The bill on our table is to exempt a certain class of aliens from the operation of this rule. Is this right, equitable, or Constitutional? To one description of aliens you apply four rules, while to another description you apply but three. You thereby infract the Constitution; and if this is not the meaning of it, I do not understand it. But on the sole ground of the pressure of other more important business, if other reasons were wanting, I should vote against the passage of the bill.

Mr. DANA called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GODDARD was not disposed to consume the time of the House; but, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) he must be permitted to say, if it was the sincere object of gentlemen on that side to save time, they would evince their sincerity by not pressing on the House business against which there were reasonable objections. The gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us that this bill is not introduced on the petitions so often referred to in this debate. All that I know is derived from the gentleman himself, who informed us lately that the petitions which he last offered were precisely similar to those which he had previously presented. Such, too, was the statement of another gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. LEIS,) who stated that the last petitions were precisely like the first, excepting the paragraph deemed exceptionable, which had been stricken out; and that both petitions were signed by the same persons. Now, the objection made to the first petition again recurs. The House did refuse to commit the first petitions on account of the indecent expressions they contained. The House pronounced the language indecent and insolent. Gentlemen on both sides expressed the same sentiment, and he rejoiced to hear it. The first petitions were not committed; the last were committed, as had been expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, to show the more marked disapprobation of the first. But no sooner are they referred than a bill is ushered into the House. If it were proper to pass such a law it ought to be on petitions couched with more decency. I believe, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that these petitions have not traversed four or five hundred miles and got back again. I believe they do not express the sense of the petitioners whose names are signed to them. For this reason I would not sanction them by passing this bill. But there are reasons of greater force against the passage. This is the same Congress that has already acted upon these very petitions. Why depart from our ordinary and established course of proceeding in this case? At the last session, similar petitions were acted upon, and no new evidence to change our minds is now alleged. The gentleman, however, from Pennsylvania, says, we are not averse to the prayer of these petitions, because those who offer them have lived under a monarchy, but because they are republican too much. They are, Mr. Speaker, republican too much! If to be the enemies of all regular government be republican, then I have no hesitation to say, I disclaim the title.

Mr. G. concluded by saying, that in every point of view in which he could consider the subject, as well on its own merits as from a want of time, he thought the House would be justified in postponing it.

Mr. DANA hoped that he should not be thought wanting in due respect to the age and logical talents of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. BACON,) even though he should refuse to relinquish his opinion, and his right of debate, in consequence of that honorable gentleman's friendly admonition, an admonition which was probably intended to operate as a command. He thought if that gentleman was really disposed to economise the time of the House, he might do it more effectually by omitting to bring forward measures which were known to be disagreeable—measures that were not in themselves necessary, and that were not expected to be acted upon, rather than by attempting to prevent gentlemen from expressing their objections to measures introduced as the bill had been.

Mr. D. was not surprised to find the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SMILIE,) warmly attached to the interest of the emigrants from Ireland. He understood that the gentleman himself was from that country, and thought it extremely natural that he should feel an attachment to his countrymen; but he thought also that the very circumstance ought to caution the House against too suddenly admitting persons, who feel similar attachments, to a participation in the direction of our public affairs. He considered that partiality which the gentleman had manifested for the country of his birth as one of the strongest and most amiable of the propensities of the human mind, yet upon that floor he could wish to see those partialities circumscribed within the limits of the United States.

Mr. LEIB said that the gentleman from Delaware had completely answered and refuted his own arguments; for if there were no aliens in the situation to be relieved by the bill, and no application had been made by them for the relief contemplated by it, his apprehensions can have no foundation of course, and the bill was no more than a dead letter. According to this gentleman's conception, then, the fears of the gentleman from Connecticut must likewise be groundless, and all his anticipations of perjuries which would be committed by the aliens, should the bill pass, must prove as visionary as his argument; for where there existed no temptation for perjury, none certainly would be committed.

But there were many in this situation, and they had applied for relief. He had presented memorials from a great number, praying for the amendment to the naturalization law contemplated by the bill. The gentleman from Maryland had likewise presented a memorial from the aliens in Baltimore to the same effect. It was therefore apparent that many were aggrieved, and the bill provided a remedy.

The gentleman from Connecticut had been very liberal in his denunciations of aliens; he seemed to derive peculiar gratification from this indulgence of his feelings; but for his part, said Mr. L., he could not enter into that gentleman's sensations, nor subscribe to his opinions. It was true, that, in the State which he had the honor to represent, there was a lawless banditti to whom the remarks of the gentleman from Connecticut would apply, who seemed to regard neither laws nor morals, and who had occasioned much trouble, vexation, and expense, to the State, but they were not aliens, but Connecticut intruders.

The gentleman from Delaware had said much in favor of the declaration called for by the existing law. What was it? Was there a magic in it—a kind of legerdemain—which, by hocus pocus, converted aliens suddenly into a fitness for citizenship? What was its slight-of-hand process, that it gave to the alien an impromptu knowledge of our Constitution and our laws? Did it possess an alchemical power, capable of an instantaneous transmutation of a base into a pure being? For his part, he believed that the residence required by law occasioned the safest and surest transmutation. It was this which gave the knowledge and feeling, and gave the opportunity, for the intercourse that amalgamated the aliens with us, and gave them a common interest. It was the surest standard by which to test the desire for citizenship; it was action, and not declaration; it was fact and not theory. He therefore felt more disposed to rely upon it than upon the empty sound of declaration, which to the gentleman from Delaware appeared so emphatic.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Naturalization.

H. OF R.

As to the inequality which gentlemen complained of, it had its existence in the present law, and not in the proposed modification. The existing law made a residence of five years necessary for the alien who arrived here after its passage, and eight years for him who came among us after the enactment of the law of 1798. So far, therefore, from an inequality being introduced by this bill, it was thereby removed; and all aliens who arrived here since 1798 were placed upon a like footing. The law of 1798 made a residence of fourteen years necessary to citizenship, and a declaration by the alien of his intention to become a citizen five years before his admission. It cannot then be imputed to the alien as a neglect, that he had not declared his intention before the law of the last session passed, as only four years out of the fourteen years probation had elapsed, and nine were given him by the law to prepare himself for his mystical and regenerative process. Besides, a declaration before the period required by the law was an affair of hazard; it was a proscription which the alien made of himself, inasmuch as it announced his alienage to the Executive, and thereby exposed him to transportation under the alien law.

The spirit, nay the letter, of the law of the last session, was in favor of the present bill; for five years only was the probationary term; its first condition was more a matter of form than of substance. In every point of view, therefore, he thought the bill ought to pass.

The question of postponement was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—yeas 40, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, James A. Bayard, Thomas Boude, Manasseh Cutler, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Thomas T. Mr. GRISWOLD said he moved to recommit the bill to a select committee for two reasons; the first was, because the bill repealed the fourth provision of the naturalization law, that required that every applicant should renounce his allegiance to all foreign Governments, and declare his determination to become a citizen. One great object of that provision was, that after the alien law shall have made this solemn declaration, it should be recorded in court. Thus he places himself under the eye of every citizen, as to his good behaviour; thus he calls upon the people to bear testimony to his good character, and that he is shortly to become a citizen of the United States. In this hasty manner this provision ought not to be repealed. If it is thought proper to repeal some of the other provisions, the declaration ought to be made for at least a month or a year preceding the admission to citizenship; but at the third reading of a bill it is impossible to amend it.

I have another view in this motion. In consequence of the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, it is questionable whether there has not been some imposition on the House—whether the petitions laid on the table have not been forged. It is certainly very extraordinary that the same petition, with that first presented, (with the exclusion of the exceptionable paragraph,) should come forward, with so little delay, from a distance of three or four hundred miles. I wish the select committee, to whom the bill may be referred, to inquire whether this imposition will not warrant the House in not proceeding further, until they know the petitions are genuine. I therefore move that the bill be referred to a select committee, instructed to inquire whether the petitions were in fact subscribed by the persons therein named.

Mr. RANDOLPH hoped the question would be divided.

The SPEAKER, according to a rule of the House, first put the question on the committing the bill to a select committee, which was lost—ayes 38, noes 42.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, on the passage of the bill, and decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—John Archer, Theodoros Bailey, Richard Brent, Robert Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Lucas Elmendorf, John Fowler, John A. Hanna, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, James Holland, David Holmes, Geo. Upham, Philip Van Cortlandt, Joseph B. Varnum, Peleg Wadsworth, Lemuel Williams, and Henry Woods.

Mr. GRISWOLD wished to submit a motion which had grown out of the debate. He thought it proper that an inquiry should be instituted respecting the alteration of the petitions from certain aliens. He therefore moved the appointment of a committee to inquire whether the petitions from sundry aliens were in fact subscribed by the persons therein named.

Mr. JACKSON hoped the House would not agree to take up this motion. As gentlemen appeared to have a wish to procrastinate, in order to frustrate a great deal of important business, necessary to be transacted, he hoped they would not be indulged.

Mr. GRISWOLD called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NICHOLSON said the motion was extremely useless. He did not believe that a committee could make the inquiry in twelve months. How is it to be done? Is the committee to go to each individual named, or are they to call witnesses before them to prove his hand-writing? He believed this the wildest scheme that had ever been imagined. For his own part, he had examined the petitions: they appear to have been cut into two parts; the offensive parts have been cut out, and the names remain as at first. Whether the person who had done this was guilty of an offence, he could not say; but he would say the offence was pardonable, as he had done nothing more than strike out what was offensive to the House. As it was impossible for any committee to make the inquiry, he hoped the resolution would not be taken up.

Mr. S. SMITH said, if he were called before the committee, he might find it a very difficult task to satisfy their inquiries. A certain petition had been presented to the House, which, on account of its language, they had refused to commit. About a week after, a similar memorial was brought to him, from Baltimore, with the offensive part cut out; and I, said Mr. S., presented it as I received it. I supposed the memorialists had themselves cut it out. I received another memorial containing the offensive language. I did not think it my duty to present this memorial. I wrote to Baltimore, and received authority from the memorialists to strike out the offensive language. I did so. Now, what do gentlemen want? Do they want to perplex the House in the transaction of the public business? If they do, I hope their views will be frustrated.

Mr. GRISWOLD.—The course pursued by the gentleman from Maryland was correct. If he was instructed by the petitioners to vary their petitions, he was undoubtedly authorized to do so. But I do not think the practice ought to be countenanced for members to vary petitions without special instruction, in order to make that palatable to the House which was not so when presented. Such a variation materially changes the petition, and though the same names may be preserved, they never can be considered as having been subscribed to the new petition. The taking a name from a letter, and annexing it to a promissory note would not make the note legal—it would be a forgery. So, taking a name from an old and annexing it to a new petition, is also a forgery.

My object is to inquire whether any such thing has been done in this case. I repeat it, that if all the petitions presented have been altered in the same way that has been stated by the gentleman from Maryland, the procedure is correct. But if a different course has been pursued—if the petitions have been changed without authority, it is a course of proceeding which this House ought not to countenance. I do not know that the facts can be had. It is probable, however, that what has been done has been done in this city; and, so far, facts will be within our reach. At any rate, no injury can arise from appointing a select committee.

The SPEAKER said he had not till this moment attended to the new rule of the House that precluded all debate respecting the determining the priority of business.

Mr. SMILIE.—Is it not proper, when gentlemen are implicated in the remarks already made, that they should have an opportunity to explain? Mr. S. was about to proceed, when

The SPEAKER called to order, and said there could be no debate on deciding whether the resolution should then be taken up.

On which, the question was taken without further debate, on taking up Mr. GRISWOLD's resolution, and decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 49, as follows:

Mr. SMILIE.—The manner in which I have conducted myself as a member of this House is known to every gentleman. But if they should judge of my conduct by a paragraph which appeared on Monday last in a paper published in this District, they would certainly conceive that I ought not to have a seat in this House. that the thing may be understood, I will read the paragraph to which I allude. [Here he read a paragraph which appeared in the Washington Federalist.]

As to all the speeches about my not being an American, I care nothing about it. I have never known that it was a crime not to be born in America. But after having been forty years in the country, I think it is too much to be called a foreigner. But, sir, to be charged with direct forgery—a crime so disgraceful—is more than I deserve. It is founded on the supposed circumstance of my having endeavored to introduce certain petitions to the House which had been refused, on account of some offensive expressions, and that I had been concerned in taking out those offensive parts. A little recollection will convince gentlemen that I had no concern with them. The first petitions that I presented from Chester county the House refused to act upon. When I presented the second petitions, I said, expressly, that they were similar to those presented before, and that I should move no order upon them. But, in order to put the matter beyond all doubt, here are the petitions themselves. I shall lay them on the table, and if any gentleman has doubts, he can satisfy himself that they have nothing to do with those which were altered. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) explained the matter to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD.)

I do not make this as a complaint to the House, but I mention it as an explanation of my own conduct.

Mr. LEIB.—The facts relating to the petition which I presented from Carlisle county are well known. The House refused to act upon them. Some time afterwards, I presented a number more, with the exceptionable passages taken out. The fact was this, sir: the petitions were sent to two gentlemen, then in the city of Washington, who had been appointed as a committee to act in behalf of these aliens. One was Mr. Clay, who has been elected as a representative to serve in the next Congress from Pennsylvania, the other was Mr. Duane. They took such order upon them as they thought proper. They were altered, and in this form I presented them to the House; and I felt myself authorized to do it. If any gentleman chooses to make an alteration in a petition which does not alter the prayer of it, to whom is he responsible? Is he responsible to the House or the person who has entrusted him as an agent to present it? In this case, would he be responsible to the House or the aliens who were concerned? But I did not take it on myself to do it myself, but took it to the authorized committee, who made the alterations.]

TUESDAY, February 22.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretaries of the Treasury and of War, and the Comptroller of the Treasury, respecting claims of Nova Scotia refugees. Referred to a select committee of three.

An engrossed bill in addition to, and modification of certain propositions contained in an act for admitting the people of the Eastern division of the Northwestern Territory as a State into the Union, was read a third time, and passed—yeas 62.

Mr. RANDOLPH defended the bill.

A bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1803 was read a third time, and passed.

A letter was received from the claimants, and their agents, of lands ceded by Georgia to the United States, declining to appear by counsel at the bar of the House; and offering certain new propositions of compromise with the United States. Referred to a Committee of the Whole to whom was referred a bill for settling claims to lands north of Tennessee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD offered a resolution altering the period of the sitting of the Supreme Court from the first Monday in February to the first Monday of August. Carried—yeas 38, nays 33. Referred to a select committee.

On motion of Mr. HUGER, leave was given to a description of claimants, other than those who had previously applied, to be heard in person or by counsel at the bar of the House this day.

When Mr. Moultrie appeared, as counsel of the said claimants, at the bar, about half-past one o'clock. After speaking about one hour and a quarter, Mr. Moultrie retired.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved the reference of the petition of Alexander Moultrie to the Committee of the Whole on the above subject.

MILITARY LAND WARRANTS.

The House took up the bill respecting military land warrants.

Mr. DAVIS hoped it would not be adopted without inquiring whether the land proposed to be given to General Lafayette was the same as was given to other Major Generals. It was true he had rendered services to the United States, for which they had made him an allowance. There were other claims, in his opinion of greater force, made day after day, without being attended to. If this provision were annexed to the bill he should vote against its passage; though, otherwise, he would be glad to vote for it. If General Lafayette was entitled to this land, he wished to see the business regularly conducted. We are now making provision for persons who have legal claims. It is right, therefore, to separate these subjects. Let us attend to one, first, and afterwards consider the other.

Mr. DAWSON.—When, on yesterday, I had the honor to submit this amendment, I indulged the pleasing hope that it would have received not only the vote of this House, but would have met with the patronage of all—of all the friends of justice, and of those who remember past services; and that it would have been adopted without delay and without debate.

In this I have been wofully disappointed. My fond anticipation was immediately damped by a gentleman from New York, on whose friendship I did count, and do now expect; and the amendment, instead of finding sympathizing advocates, has met with an unexpected opposition; instead of finding friends proud to reward past services, it has met with enemies, seeking for reasons to withhold justice.

Mr. Chairman, the search has been in vain; the grateful, the patriot mind will remember those services, while the reflection on a wish to withhold justice will be left as consolation to those who have made the search.

Sir, it was my wish, and it is my determination to support this amendment solely on the grounds of services rendered to us. Whatever may have been the conduct and the situation of General Lafayette since our Revolution, humanity may lament; but, sir, it belongs to us to pay this tribute to justice, if not to gratitude.

Sir, on yesterday, I stated what was known to every gentleman of this House, that this gentleman at an early period of life, animated by the love of liberty, left the pleasures of an enticing Court, encountered the danger of winds and waves, and entered into the service of a country known to him only by name, and endeared to him only by its devotion to that flame which he felt himself. In this service he continued until the end of our war, submitting to all the hardships and fatigues of the field; leading our armies to victory, and exposing himself to every danger; and this without any compensation, and at the sacrifice of the greater part of his private fortune.

I stated more—that that fortune is now much reduced; and this is what I do know. Yes, sir, I have spent two days with this adopted child of America on his little farm. I saw him surrounded by an amiable family, but not with wealth. I heard him pouring forth his best wishes for the prosperity and happiness of this country; and I witnessed his constant exertions to promote its interests. It may not be improper here to remember what I do know. Some short time before I went to France, the First Consul applied to Mr. Lafayette to come to this country as Minister. He replied, "I am by birth a French citizen, by adoption a citizen of the United States. I have served in that country, and am so attached to its interest that I doubt, if a case of difficulty should arise, whether I should do justice to my own; if I did, I am sure I should be suspected, and therefore I will not place myself in that delicate situation."

And now, sir, what is it that it is proposed to do for this gentleman; for him who rendered you services without emolument, and risked his life without hesitation; to this citizen of the United States; and not a foreigner, as the gentleman from Kentucky has been pleased to call him? It is to give to him what we give to others; and what he never would have received had it not been for the reverse of his fortunes. And shall we hesitate? I trust not.

Sir, this is not only a question of justice, but it is of feeling; every soldier, every officer must feel for a fellow-soldier and a fellow-officer, and every citizen for a fellow citizen; and such is Mr. Lafayette.

Whatever may be the fate of that amendment, if it shall be adopted I shall feel proud for my country. If it shall be negatived, I shall have the pleasing reflection of having discharged a duty to my country and to my own feelings.

Mr. T. MORRIS said that the opposition he had made was more to the manner than to the matter of the motion. He thought it improper to decide upon it at so late an hour, and when there was scarcely a quorum of members within the walls. I have, said Mr. M., no objection to the grant. On the contrary I think it ought to be made in consideration of the circumstances of General Lafayette. I should indeed have wished that it had been the subject of a distinct bill. The value of gifts of this nature depends as much on the manner in which they are made, as on the gifts themselves; and I think the donation would, in this case, have been deemed more honorable, if a special bill had been passed, instead of inserting a clause in another bill. If there were time to bring in a distinct bill, I should now vote against the amendment; but as I am unwilling to hazard the object altogether, I shall vote for it: expressing my regret, at the same time, that the gentleman who has viewed the distressed situation of General Lafayette had not sooner brought the business forward.

A debate of short duration ensued, between Messrs. S. SMITH, SHEPARD, DAWSON, and BACON, in favor of the amendment, and Mr. DAVIS against it, when it was carried without a division.

On engrossing the bill for a third reading, Messrs. SOUTHARD, and SHEPARD spoke in favor of, and Mr. VARNUM against it—carried, and ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

OHIO SCHOOL FUND.

An engrossed bill in addition to, and in modification of, the act entitled "An act to enable the people of the Eastern division of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," was read the third time.

Mr. GREGG said, that when the resolutions on which this bill is predicated were before the House, he had very briefly stated some objections which he had against adopting them. A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) had offered some arguments to obviate his objections, but they had not produced that effect in his mind: on the contrary, by reflecting on the subject since that time, he was now more fully convinced that the opinion which he then expressed was correct.

At this late period of the session he had no wish to bring on a lengthy discussion, nor had he any expectation that, by anything he could say, he would be able to prevent the passage of the bill. The strong disposition which the House had discovered in its favor, and the unprecedented rapidity with which it had been hurried on the preceding day, left him no room to hope, that any efforts of his could check its progress. He would however remark, that it was very unusual for a bill of such importance to be acted on the same day on which it was printed and laid on our table, and of course before members could have read it over, and made themselves acquainted with its provisions. It would be vain for him to propose amendments, because the bill was not susceptible of such amendments as would induce him to vote for it. He thought it wrong in principle, and he did not believe it would be found expedient in its effects.

He had always been accustomed to consider the lands of the United States a common property, in which every citizen of the Government was equally interested, and to which they all had an equal right. These lands were generally considered as a fund out of which the public debt, contracted during the Revolutionary war, was to be discharged. The cession of the lands, made by the States which claimed them, was for the common benefit, and as such they have always been considered. He had before him the act of cession made by the State of Virginia of the very land in question, the preamble of which he would beg leave to read, and to the particular expression of which he hoped gentlemen would attend:

"Whereas, the Congress of the United States did, by their act of the sixth day of September, 1780, recommend to the several States in the Union, having claims to waste and unappropriated lands in the western country, a liberal cession to the United States of a portion of their respective claims, for the common benefit of the Union;

"And whereas this Commonwealth did, on the second day of January, 1781, yield to the Congress of the United States, for the benefit of the said States, all right, title, and claim, which the said Commonwealth had to the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio," &c.

Let us attend to the expressions here used. Congress asks the land for the "common benefit of the Union;" Virginia reiterates the sentiment, and says she yields it for the "benefit of the said States."

Farther, the Indian title to these lands has been extinguished by money taken out of the Treasury of the United States. Every person in the country has contributed his proportion of tax to effect that object. The citizens of Maine, or any other district, are therefore, in this respect, also equally entitled with those of Ohio, to all the benefits resulting from the sale of these lands. With what face of justice can we then put our hands into this common fund, or lay hold of any portion of these lands, and apply them to the use and benefit of the people in one part of the country, to the entire exclusion of all the rest, as is contemplated by this bill? What authority have we to give the people of Ohio land equal to a thirty-sixth part of their whole State; or to expend on the improvement of their roads, three per cent. of all the money arising from the sale of public lands in that country? It appeared to him an assumption of power which did not of right belong to them. It was an act of usurpation which he had not been able to discover any principle whatever to warrant or justify.

The conditions expressed in the act passed at the last session of Congress, authorizing the people of the Northwestern Territory to frame a constitution and State government themselves, he thought very exceptionable. The terms prescribed in this bill, were, in his view, much more so. The manner in which they were brought forward, rendered them so. They were dictated by a small portion of people who had assumed the power of imposing terms on the Government, and of telling it how the public property must be disposed of. If Government has not the power of managing its property its own way, if it must thus submit to such terms as any particular portion of the people may from time to time see proper to prescribe—what is it? Nothing but an empty name. The exemption of the public lands from taxes for five years, that was spoken of as an equivalent, he considered as nothing, or at least as very inadequate. Upon the whole, although he had no prospect of preventing the passage of the bill, he thought himself in duty bound to protest against the principles and provisions which it contained.

Mr. RANDOLPH was happy to hear these sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He concurred with him completely in his premises, although he differed from him, in some degree, in his conclusions. It is true that the grant of land made by Virginia was for the common benefit of the whole Union. It was considered when made, and is still considered, as a common fund, for purposes in which the general benefit is concerned. It was with that view that as a member of the committee which brought in the bill, he was favorable to it. But before he proceeded to consider its merits, he must be indulged with a few words on its progress to a passage. The bill had been reported on Friday, and then ordered to be printed; the original draught had been mislaid; a new copy had been required for the press, and it had consequently not been laid on their tables till yesterday; though any member anxious to have procured a copy, might have obtained it on Saturday. The gentleman informs us that it passed to a third reading on the same day, (Monday.) True, because no gentleman protested against it. Did the gentleman expect that the friends of the bill would have risen and objected to it. They, on the contrary, inferred that as no objection was offered, none existed. And why did they draw this inference that there was no objection? Because the report, on which every syllable is predicated, passed with but one dissenting voice, that of the member from Pennsylvania.

Now let us examine the merits of the bill. According to the doctrine of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the broad principle he has assumed would vitiate the original principle of appropriation for schools under the ordinance. Mr. R. believed that the appropriation while it protected the interests of literature, would enhance the value of property. Can we suppose that emigration will not be promoted by it, and that the value of lands will not be enhanced by the emigrant obtaining the fullest education for his children; and is it not better to receive two dollars an acre with an appropriation for schools, than seventy-five cents an acre without such appropriation? Indubitably it is. The same reasoning will hold good for giving the people of Ohio the salt springs, and for appropriating a portion of the proceeds of the lands to laying out roads as an equivalent for the exemption of the lands of the United States from taxation. Gentlemen who are not operated upon by this principle, and a desire to establish a liberal provision for schools, will vote against the bill. These reasons were entirely satisfactory to the committee.

H. OF R.

Proceedings.

Mr. R. said he was at a loss to reconcile the practice of gentlemen with their theory. When a proposition was made in Philadelphia to accept the jurisdiction in Connecticut, which, though pompously called an act, (Mr. R. here quoted the title,) was in fact a cession of the soil; the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GREGG) voted in the affirmative, while I, said Mr. R., was in the negative. I am at a loss to reconcile his vote then with his present arguments. The gentleman, who thinks all the lands of the United States a general fund for public purposes, was for giving up three millions of acres, to the value of six millions of dollars, without receiving any valuable consideration; and now he is averse to an appropriation which gives up nothing, but which will necessarily enhance the value of public property. By the law passed the last session, we made certain propositions to the State of Ohio, subject to the right of that State to accept or reject them. These propositions that State has agreed to, with certain modifications. To make them binding on Ohio, it is necessary for us to accept them in toto, as modified. If there is but a partial acceptance, that State is not bound to exempt the public land from taxation. But if they are agreed to in toto, the compact is final and binding. I have only to add that this is a desirable object, as the exemption will be more than an equivalent for that which is surrendered on our part, and to observe that however plain and easy it may be to settle the abstract principles, in cases where States are litigants, there must be some immediate umpire.

Mr. GREGG wished to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Virginia who had just sat down. The gentleman had charged him with inconsistency, because he opposed the present bill, although he had voted for the act assuming the jurisdiction of the Connecticut Reserve. The cases were by no means analogous. Connecticut had a claim. She herself, at least, considered it such, and in virtue thereof had issued grants, and taken possession of the land. In the present instance there is no claim. None is pretended. It is an absolute grant of a common property to the exclusive benefit of a few. Such grants he should always consider it his duty to oppose.

After a few words from Mr. BACON, in favor of the bill, it passed in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, February 23.

An engrossed bill to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act, entitled "An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen," was read the third time: Whereupon,

A motion was made and seconded that the House do, by unanimous consent, amend the first section of the said bill, by striking out therefrom the words "and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter:"

And the question being taken thereupon, it was unanimously resolved in the affirmative.

The said bill, being so amended at the Clerk's table, was then brought in engrossed, and again read; and on the question thereupon,

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren, for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen; and for other purposes.'"

[This bill contains an honorable donation of land, equal to the quantity allowed to an officer of the same grade, to General Lafayette.]

A memorial of James Strawbridge, in behalf of himself, and as trustee for the Tennessee Company, was presented to the House and read, stating his claim as an original proprietor and trustee, as aforesaid, to a certain quantity of land situate in the territory lately ceded to the United States by the State of Georgia: and submitting to the consideration of Congress certain terms and conditions, therein specified, upon which the memorialist on his part, and in behalf of the said Tennessee Company, is willing to relinquish to the United States the title to the said land, in fee simple.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed, on the nineteenth instant, the bill for settling sundry claims to public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee.

Mr. NICHOLSON called for the order of the day on the bill to regulate the grants of land south of Tennessee.

Mr. BAYARD called for a resolution on making an indemnification for French spoliations.

Mr. THOMPSON called for the bill for the government of Columbia.

The House agreed to Mr. NICHOLSON's motion, and went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for regulating the grants of land south of Tennessee.

The bill corresponds in its leading features, with the report of the commissioners.

Mr. ISRAEL SMITH moved an amendment to the first section, reinstating the claimants under the company of military adventurers in lands held by them under Great Britain.

This motion was supported by Messrs. ISRAEL SMITH, GRISWOLD, DANA, and BACON; and opposed by Messrs. NICHOLSON, R. WILLIAMS, MERIWETHER, and S. SMITH.

The amendment was lost—yeas 14.

Several amendments were then made in the details of the bill.

FEBRUARY, 1803.

Supervisors.

H. OF R.

SUPERVISORS.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill authorizing the transfer of the duties of the supervisor to any other office. Referred to a Committee of the Whole to day.

The House went immediately into a Committee of the Whole on the bill.

Mr. R. explained the object of the bill, by stating that it had been introduced in consequence of an application from the Treasury Department. It was considered, that in those districts where the collection of the internal taxes was nearly completed, and where the supervisor may, from the smallness of the commission, be unwilling to discharge the duties of the office, they might be transferred to some other officer of the United States who might be willing to undertake to discharge them. In cases where the compensation will be extremely small, it is proposed to allow a salary not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. DANA suggested the propriety of limiting the transfer of duties to officers employed in the collection of the customs.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved to limit the power of the President to the appointment of revenue officers.

On this motion a short conversation ensued.

Those in favor of the motion thought it proper for the Legislature to designate as closely as practicable the description of officers from which the President should be empowered to nominate those to whom the duties of supervisor should be transferred; while those against the motion remarked that authority to appoint any officer would be safely vested in the President in a business of so trifling a nature, and that convenience would result from not abridging the field of choice.

The amendment was lost without a division.

The committee rose, and reported the bill; and the House immediately took it into consideration.

The SPEAKER put the question on engrossing the bill.

Mr. GRISWOLD observed that in all instances where moneys of the United States were received, bonds had been required. In this bill there was no such provision. He was against such an innovation, and must therefore vote against the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH replied that marshals, and other officers, on whom those duties might be devolved, did give security for the faithful performance of duty. The duties of supervisor, when transferred to them, would be their duties.

This was contested by Messrs. GRISWOLD, and HENDERSON.

Mr. NICHOLSON moved an amendment requiring bonds to be given, which was carried without a division; when the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, February 24.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter to him from the Comptroller of the Treasury, dated the twenty-third instant; also a statement of the emoluments of the officers of the customs, for the year one thousand eight hundred and two; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Message, received yesterday from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State on the case of the Danish brigantine Hendrick, was read and, together with the documents transmitted therewith, referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and one; also, a letter to him from the Register of the Treasury, in relation thereto; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill authorizing the transfer of the duties of Supervisor to any other office was read the third time and passed.

A memorial of Thomas Young, in behalf of himself and others, was presented to the House and read, stating his claim as a proprietor in a company, entitled, by purchase, to a quantity of land situated in the territory lately ceded to the United States by the State of Georgia, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, and submitting to the consideration of Congress, certain terms and conditions therein specified, upon which the memorialist, on his part, and in behalf of those whom he represents, will agree to relinquish to the United States a right to the said land, in fee simple.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the nineteenth instant, the bill for settling sundry claims to public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to make Beaufort and Pasamaguddy ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of Saint Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario, and the appointment of a surveyor at Nanjemoy; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported to the House with two amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The said bill then being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States," to which the Committee of the whole House reported an amendment on the sixteenth instant: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, that the farther consideration thereof be postponed until the first Monday in November next, it passed in the negative.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the salt springs on the waters of the Wabash river; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill for erecting a light-house at the entrance of Penobscot bay, or any other place in its vicinity that may be deemed preferable by the Secretary of the Treasury; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported two amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A letter was received from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a report of the emoluments of the officers employed in the customs.

Also from the same department, an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for 1801.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill amending the act for the Military Establishment.

The amendments are, a new section authorizing the employment of one officer and eighteen men to make practical experiments; and allowing three thousand dollars, instead of two thousand dollars, for clerk hire in certain offices.

Amendments agreed to—yeas 33, nays 23.

Mr. THOMPSON said there was a long bill for the organization of the militia of Columbia, which had been referred to a Committee of the Whole. From its great length he was apprehensive, unless some other disposition were made, there would not be time to pass it through both Houses. As it was indispensable that something should be done, he hoped it would be referred to a select committee other than that which had reported it, on whose report it might be engrossed for a third reading.

Agreed to, and referred to a committee of seven.

The House took up the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the bill regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee; and agreed to them.

CANADIAN REFUGEES.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee appointed on the twenty-third instant, presented a bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land appropriated for the refugees from the British provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia;" which was read twice and engrossed, and ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. I. SMITH renewed his amendment, rejected yesterday, to insert after the word "who," in the third line of the second section, the words "not being enemies of the American Revolution, and;"

also, by inserting after the word "did," in the fourth line of the same section, the words following, to wit:

"With the consent of the British Government of West Florida, on or before the day when the British possessions of West Florida were conquered of Spain, actually inhabit and cultivate a tract of land in the Mississippi Territory, not claimed by virtue of the preceding section, or of any British grant, or of the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, and was driven therefrom by the events of the war between the United States and Great Britain; and to every person, or the legal representative of every person, who, being either the head of a family, or of twenty-one years of age, did"

And the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 17, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—James A. Bayard, John Condit, John Davenport, Ebenezer Elmer, Calvin Goddard, John A. Hanna, Daniel Heister, Benjamin Huger, James Mott, Thomas Plater, William Shepard, Israel Smith, John Cotton Smith, Samuel Thatcher, Joseph B. Varnum, Peleg Wadsworth, and Lemuel Williams.

lumbia, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

An engrossed bill for erecting a light-house at the entrance of Penobscot bay, or any other place in its vicinity, that may be deemed preferable by the Secretary of the Treasury, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, was read the third time and passed.

On motion

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to procure and lay before Congress, at the commencement of their next session, an authentic list of the individuals who, agreeably to the former resolves of Congress, were placed on the list of invalid pensioners in the State of South Carolina, and, by the regulations of that State, were entitled to pensions at the commencement of the present Government of the United States, but who have not since been paid the same.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the Court of the United States in Kentucky;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the committee appointed, on the fifteenth instant, on "the provision which ought to be made by law for the regulation of quarantine within the District of Columbia," made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the same committee, also reported a bill to regulate the quarantine of ships and vessels in the port of Alexandria; which was read twice and committed to the Committee of the whole House last appointed.

The order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for establishing the Government of the Territory of Columbia, being called for, a motion was made and seconded that the said order of the day be postponed until the first Monday in November next. And the question being taken thereupon, it passed in the negative.

PRINTING PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. ROBERT WILLIAMS rose and expressed a hope that gentlemen who had called for other business would give way to him for a moment, as he wished only to move for the printing of a document. The floor was conceded to him, and he then stated that an order of this House had passed, at the last session of Congress, calling upon the President for certain detailed accounts of the expenditure of public money, to which order he referred from the Journals of the last session of Congress, and which is in the words following, viz:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause the proper officers to prepare and lay before the House, during the first week of the ensuing session of Congress, the following statements:

"A detailed account of the expenditures and application of all public moneys which have passed through the Quartermaster General's department from the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-seven, to the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and one.

"A similar account of the expenditure of all public moneys which have passed through the Navy agents.

"A similar account of the expenditure and application of all moneys drawn out of the Treasury for the contingencies of the Military and Naval Establishments.

"Copies of the contracts made by the Navy Department for the purchase of timber and stores, and the accounts of moneys paid under such contracts."

Mr. WILLIAMS stated, that, conformable to this order, those accounts had been prepared and transmitted to the House by Message from the President on the 23d of December last. He therefore moved that the Message of the President, together with the documents accompanying it, be printed.

After a few words of desultory conversation, the motion was agreed to by the House.

Mr. NICHOLSON then rose and said, that he wished to make another motion respecting those documents. He said that he had seen estimates of the expense of printing them, and as business of that kind was usually done, the expense would amount to a sum from eight to ten thousand dollars; but he had seen proposals from two printers on the subject, both of whom had stated that they would print the documents for a much less sum than they would ordinarily cost, as they could be printed during the recess of Congress, and they had journeymen now employed who would not be much engaged during the recess. One of the printers, Mr. William Duane, had offered to print them for five thousand five hundred dollars; the other, Mr. Smith, had offered to do the work for five thousand two hundred dollars. He therefore moved a resolution, that the sum of five thousand two hundred dollars be appropriated to this object, and that it should be paid out of the contingent funds of this House, provided the expense of printing does not exceed that sum.

While the House were waiting for Mr. N.'s motion to be reduced to writing,

Mr. VAN CORTLAND rose and said, that as he had voted for the printing of the document, without knowing the expense, he would now move to reconsider that question.

The SPEAKER observed, that this motion could not be received until the one before the House was disposed of.

Mr. NICHOLSON's motion being reduced to writing, was read.

Mr. GRISWOLD rose and remarked, that he believed the object which the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) had in view would not be accomplished by this resolution. The House had made a positive order to print the documents—it would become the duty of the Clerk of this House to procure it to be done, whatever might be the expense attending it. The expense, of course, like that of any other printing done by order of the House, would be paid out of the contingent fund, and an appropriation of money could not be made by a resolution of this House. Moneys could be drawn from the Treasury only in consequence of appropriations made by law. The resolution, therefore, was both useless and improper. If the gentleman wished to limit the expense of printing these documents it should have been done by way of proviso to the order for printing, which had just been passed.

Mr. NICHOLSON withdrew his resolution, when the motion for reconsideration was renewed.

Mr. GODDARD said he hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail; not that he wished to prevent the documents from being printed, but because he wished that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. NICHOLSON) might have an opportunity to try the sense of the House upon his proposition to limit the expense, which could not be done unless the vote was reconsidered, so as to bring the subject again before the House. He thought there was another reason for reconsidering the vote. He observed that the vote that had passed in pursuance of the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. R. WILLIAMS,) was simply to print the documents, without designating to what use they were to be applied when printed; nor was any direction given as to the number of copies to be printed. It was usual in such orders to express the use to which the document directed to be printed is to be applied.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said he hoped the motion would not prevail. He did not wish to have the expense limited by a proviso, which might prevent the printing, if the expense should exceed the limited sum. He wished to have the documents printed if it should cost ten thousand dollars.

Mr. ELMENDORF was against reconsidering the vote. He said that at the time when the documents were transmitted to the House he was the only member of the committee of investigation who was present. He thought it better, therefore, to delay the motion for printing until the arrival of the other members; but he wished the documents printed, let it cost what it would. It would be recollected that this embraced the accounts of the expenditure from the contingent funds of the departments for several years; therefore the expense was great. But such an account ought every year to be published.

Mr. NICHOLSON expressed the same sentiment.

Mr. GODDARD called for the reading of the resolution of last session. He said he believed the documents went much farther than the expenditure of moneys from the contingent fund; they appeared to him to be a mere transcript of almost all the books of the Departments of War and the Navy for several years.

Mr. MITCHELL was in favor of having the documents printed. He said that if the President had thought proper to communicate these documents to us, and direct them to be extracted from the books of the departments, it must be for some valuable purpose, and he thought we could do no less than pay a respectful attention to the President's communication, and order them to be printed. It might, for aught he knew, be necessary hereafter to act upon them further. He would pursue the same course as was pursued respecting the census last year. That was a work very difficult of execution, and cost considerable money, and yet the House ordered it printed.

Here the SPEAKER read the resolution of last session called for by Mr. GRISWOLD. After which,

Mr. BAYARD rose and said, that if the gentleman from New York (Mr. MITCHELL) had attended to the subject, he would have found that it was not necessary to incur the expense of printing these documents out of respect to the President. The call for the papers proceeded from this House. The President knew nothing of what they contained, but had acted only in obedience to the resolution of the House. It was therefore entirely an affair of our own. Mr. B. said he wished the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) when he moved for printing these documents, had been good enough to assign one solitary reason for so doing. For his part he could perceive no good purpose to be answered by it. No gentleman had examined the documents, or knew what they contained, and yet we are to incur a large expense for printing this mass of papers without knowing what they contained.

Mr. S. SMITH expressed himself against the printing of the documents. He said no one good purpose could be answered by it. Those documents had already cost the United States more than five thousand dollars in transcribing them from the books of the departments—three additional clerks having been constantly employed during the whole recess of Congress for this purpose.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. NICHOLSON then offered a resolution on this subject, which, in consequence of a suggestion from Mr. GRISWOLD, he consented to vary, and which is in the words following, viz:

"Resolved, That the Message of the President of the 23d of December last, together with the documents accompanying the same, be printed for the use of the members, provided the expense shall not exceed the sum of five thousand two hundred dollars."

Mr. R. WILLIAMS called for a division of the question, observing that he wished to vote for printing the documents, but not for limiting the expense.

The SPEAKER declared the question to be divisible.

Mr. BACON hoped the documents would be printed. It would be recollected that the report of the investigating committee, so called, called forth the talents of a gentleman who had been lately high in office, in an address to the public, in which the conduct of the committee had been strongly condemned, and through that committee the conduct of this House. Another gentleman, lately high in office, had transmitted a long representation to this House, during the present session, upon which no order had been taken. He wished the documents published, that they might, if they would do so, justify the conduct of that committee and this House.

Mr. ELMER declared himself to be against the printing. No good purpose would be answered by it, and he should consider it as expending a large sum of money uselessly.

Mr. BAYARD said he would move to refer the resolution to a select committee. His object, he said, was that the documents referred to might be examined, and such parts of them selected and published as would, in the opinion of the committee, be useful. No gentleman pretended to have read or examined these documents at all. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. R. WILLIAMS) did not pretend that he had read, or knew what the documents contained, and yet he was willing to incur an expense of ten thousand dollars to print them.

Mr. R. WILLIAMS said that he had been called upon to assign his motives for having these documents printed. He was willing to do so. They related to the expenditure of public money, and he thought we ought always to be informed of the manner in which that is done. These documents had been transcribed for the use of this House, and would be useless unless printed. But, sir, I have another reason: these officers, who know very little respecting their duty, excepting how to draw warrants on the Treasury for money, have passed through their hands large sums of public money. I do not know that we can get any of it back again; but I would at least hold them up to public detestation.

But why do gentlemen feel alarmed? The gentleman from Delaware seems afraid that these accounts should be made public, and therefore opposes the printing of the documents.

Mr. NICHOLSON said that one part of the documents moved to be printed were connected with the report of the investigating committee, so called; the other was not. As to that report, he wanted no explanation of his conduct on that subject. The report was printed, and must speak for itself. He would not consent to publish the documents by way of answer to gentlemen who were inculpated by that report. It was true that large balances appeared upon the books unsettled; that those balances were due, he did not pretend to say; nor did the report so state it. Upon the late Quartermaster General's account there appeared to be a balance of $800,000. Those accounts had not been settled by that officer. I do not mean to charge him with having improperly expended money. I am not in the habit of making such charges unless possessed of proof to support them. But those accounts, I believe, have not been settled to this day.

There were also sundry contracts which had been entered into by the Navy Department, respecting which some complaint had been made. He said that he was not, perhaps, technically correct in saying that these documents related only to the expenditure from the contingent funds of the departments, but he believed he was substantially correct.

Mr. T. MORRIS made some remarks which were not distinctly heard.

Mr. GODDARD rose and said, that he could not but express his surprise and astonishment at a remark which fell from a gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. WILLIAMS.) Is it possible, sir, that I understood the gentleman correctly? If I did, the gentleman is pleased to remark of the late heads of the departments, and that in a general and unqualified manner, that they knew very little respecting the duties of their offices, but to draw warrants on the Treasury for money! Of these officers the gentleman does not profess to entertain any expectation that one cent will be recovered; and yet the gentleman says, that he wishes the documents to be printed, in order to hold them up to public detestation, even if the expense should be ten or twenty thousand dollars! What, sir! are we to expend ten or twenty thousand dollars to purchase public detestation? And for whom? For officers whom gentlemen do not pretend have embezzled one cent of public treasure. For, in the same moment in which the gentleman expresses his willingness to expend this large sum, to excite public indignation against these officers, he acknowledged that no money is to be recovered from them. If any has been embezzled, it surely can be recovered. That gentleman was himself a member of the investigating committee, so called. Of course, he has examined the accounts of the officers under the late Administration. If any moneys have been embezzled, why has not that gentleman, in his place, brought forward some proposition to have them called to account for those moneys? This would give them an opportunity to justify themselves, or be condemned. But this is not done. Many gentlemen, and particularly the chairman of the investigating committee, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) had the candor, last session, publicly to state, that he did not believe that one dollar of public money, had, by these officers, been applied to their own private use; and, indeed, the whole charge which now lies against any of them, is applying money to objects to which it had not been specially appropriated; and this charge seems to be much diminished by the manner in which the present Administration have found it necessary to consider specific appropriations. The result of all this is, according to the doctrine of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) that men have been employed in public stations: public money has gone through their hands; they have faithfully applied it to public uses, and done their duty; we refuse to commence any suit against them, or give them any opportunity to be heard, and yet it is publicly stated, on the floor of this House, by a member of the investigating committee, that they know very little about their duty, excepting how to draw warrants on the Treasury for money! Let me ask gentlemen if this is fair? Is it candid? Is it doing by those men, as, under like circumstances, we would be willing to be done by ourselves? I have no partiality, sir, to the men. I was not in the Government until all went out of office, and am scarcely personally known to any of them. But, sir, I think the characters of all men, and more especially faithful public servants, ought to be held too sacred to be thus sported with.

But, sir, while I am upon this subject, let me ask, what has become of the zeal which was displayed at the last session respecting the business of this investigating committee? That report was then said to be but in part. Some gentlemen proposed giving the committee power to sit during the recess of Congress. The partial report was made at the close of the last session. The subject has been permitted quietly to rest until the last days of this session. Not a word has been said on this subject. No further progress made in reporting, and we are, at this late hour, called on to expend thousands of dollars, not to look up public treasures which have been squandered, but to purchase public detestation for faithful officers. But, Mr. Speaker, I mean not, by the remarks which I have made, to oppose the printing of the documents. I am aware, sir, what construction would be put upon such an opposition from such a quarter.

The gentleman from North Carolina has already seized, with avidity, upon the remarks which have been made against printing them by the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. BAYARD.) He says that we are afraid to have them published, and this is the language which others will hold on the subject. We have gone too far, sir, to recede. It is stated, by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) that the documents have already cost us more than five thousand dollars, and although that gentleman is probably correct, when he says that they will be useless if printed, yet that ought to have been considered before they were called for. Having called for them, unless they are printed, they are certainly useless. I wish not to screen public defaulters, if any there are, from justice; I know little respecting these men.

If they have embezzled public money, we owe it to ourselves, and to our constituents, to inquire into it. If, on the other hand, they have been faithful and honest, we owe it to them, after proceeding thus far, to publish those documents, that they may, as I fully believe that they will, wholly exculpate them from these unjust and ungenerous insinuations.

Mr. GRISWOLD rose and was beginning to comment on the remarks of Mr. R. WILLIAMS, when Mr. W. rose and requested liberty to explain.

Mr. WILLIAMS remarked, that one gentleman from Connecticut had commented upon what he said, and he had not interrupted him; but when another gentleman was proceeding in the same manner, he wished to say that he had not made the observations attributed to him respecting all the officers who had, under the former Administration, been entrusted with public money. He said some of them, &c.

Mr. GRISWOLD proceeded and said, that unless the gentleman saw fit to point out to whom his remarks applied, he did not see that he had very much qualified them. Mr. G. said that he was also a member of the investigating committee, and although he did not concur in the report, or know what it contained until it was ready to be presented to the House, yet he was frequently at the public offices, and heard the answers to the inquiries which were made, and examined the accounts. That of the Quartermaster General had been mentioned, and a balance of $300,000 stated as unsettled against him. Mr. G. said, with respect to that, no one pretended it was due. That officer had presented for settlement accounts to balance it, and perhaps more than enough; but, as he understood, the settlement was impeded on account of some boats which were sold and not accounted for to the satisfaction of the accountant of the War Department. When this difficulty was done away, nothing would prevent a settlement of his accounts.

Mr. NICHOLSON explained. He said he did not undertake to state the nature of the difficulties respecting the settlement of the accounts of the late Quartermaster General; but he must say, that he did not understand that they were of the nature stated by the gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. GRISWOLD,) but of a different kind.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that two reasons had been stated for printing these documents; one was, that certain officers might be held up to public detestation; but will this answer the purpose of gentlemen? He believed not. One party might believe their statements; the other might disbelieve them. But can you criminate any of those officers? If not, all public detestation would be taken away and subside, and perhaps a contrary effect be produced. Another reason which had been stated was to place before us certain contracts made by the Navy Department, under the former Administration, respecting the purchase of timber, and respecting which, complaint had been made. With respect to that subject, he was able to state to the House, that those contracts were highly injurious to the individuals who had made them; so much so, that, in every instance, excepting one, application had been made to the Navy Department by those individuals, to be released from their contract. In one instance a man had made two contracts, one of which he deemed advantageous, the other not so. He was offered to have both contracts given up, but refused. In all others, they had been injurious to the individuals, and, in some instances, persons had been almost wholly ruined by these contracts with the Navy Department.

But why should we expend this money in printing this mass of papers. Gentlemen say, to give them publicity. Printing will not do it. Nobody will read them when printed. They are mere transcripts from the books of the departments, and are very voluminous. No one had examined them, or could state what they contained. If there are any parts of them which would implicate the late officers of Government, or any of them, he doubted not but that the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) knowing his duty, would, in his place, bring forward an inquiry, which should be calculated to recover back money. But will you get any? No, not even the expense of printing the documents. Mr. S. concluded by expressing his decided disapprobation of printing the documents.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. BAYARD repelled the insinuation which had been made by Mr. W. at some length. He stated his recollection of the account of the Quartermaster General to be similar to that of Mr. GRISWOLD, and also stated that the Committee were informed last year by the accountant of the Navy Department that the sum which would be finally lost upon the settlement of all the accounts in that department, would be very inconsiderable; and expressed his wish that the documents should be examined by a select committee, and such parts only printed as would be useful.

When, after a few remarks from Mr. HOLLAND, the question on the resolution was taken and carried—yeas 38, nays 28, as follows:

Whereupon, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 26.

On motion, the House was cleared of all persons, except the members and the Clerk: Whereupon, a motion was made and seconded that the injunction of secrecy upon the members, so far as relates to all future proceedings to be had on two bills, which have passed this House and the Senate, one entitled "An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," and another, entitled "An act for extending the external commerce of the United States," be taken off. And the question being taken thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred, on the eleventh instant, the petition of Oliver Pollock, presented the tenth of February, one thousand eight hundred and two, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the whole House to whom was committed, on the fifteenth instant, the report of a select committee "on the expediency of extending the time for the settlement of claims for services rendered, and supplies furnished, during the Revolutionary war."

Resolved, That there be a call of the House to-day at four o'clock, post meridian.

Resolved, That when this House adjourns, it will adjourn until Monday morning next, ten o'clock.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Joshua Harvey and others; and after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with several amendments thereto: which were read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be recommitted to Mr. BAYARD, Mr. NICHOLSON, and Mr. BRENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendatory bill more effectually to provide for the organization of the Militia of the District of Columbia; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported with an amendment which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the eleventh instant, to whom was referred a memorial of sundry sugar refiners of the city of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland; and, after some time spent therein, the committee rose and reported to the House their agreement to the resolution contained therein, with an amendment; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said resolution, as amended, being twice read at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That no internal duty shall be collected on sugars removed from the refinery since the thirtieth day of June, eighteen hundred and two; any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Ways and Means do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented, according to order, a bill for the relief of the sugar refiners within the United States; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole to the bill to reduce the Marine Corps of the United States; and, the said amendments being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Resolved, That the call of the House, directed to be on this day, at four o'clock, post meridian, be postponed for half an hour.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims, of the sixteenth instant, on the memorial of Paul Coulon; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolution contained therein; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved That there be paid to Paul Coulon, as agent for the captors of the ship Betty Cathcart, and brig Aaron, prizes to the French privateer La Bellone, out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of six thousand two hundred and forty-one dollars and forty-four cents, being the amount retained by the Treasury Department from the sales of the ship Betty Cathcart, for duties on the cargo of the brig Aaron.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee of Claims do prepare and bring in the same.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the court of the United States in Kentucky district, was read three times and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to alter and discontinue certain post roads, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Resolved, That the call of the House, directed to be on this day, at half past four o'clock, in the afternoon, be postponed until eleven o'clock in the morning on Monday next.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was, this day, recommitted the bill for the relief of Josiah Harvey, and others, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Paul Coulon; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House immediately.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into the said committee; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported to the House, without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee who were instructed, by a resolution of this House of the twenty-eighth ultimo, "to digest some plan by which it can be ascertained what quantity of surveyed or patented land belonging to the officers and soldiers of Virginia, on State and Continental establishments, was ceded to the Cherokee Indians, by the treaty of Holstein, of the second of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one," made a report thereon; which was read: Whereupon,

Ordered, That the consideration of the said report be postponed until Monday next.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit, under his frank, to each member of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States of the present Congress, a copy of the laws of the present session of Congress, as soon as the same may be printed.

A memorial of sundry citizens of the Territory of Columbia was presented to the House and read, stating their approbation of the provisions contained in a bill now depending before this House, for the government of the said Territory; and praying that the same may be passed into a law during the present session of Congress.—Referred

MONDAY, February 28.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Joshua Harvey, and others, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Paul Coulon was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia was read the third time, and passed.

Resolved, That the call of the House directed by a vote of Saturday last, to be on this day, at eleven o' clock in the morning, be postponed until four o' clock, post meridian.

Ordered, That the Committee of Claims, to whom were recommended, on the twenty-sixth instant, a Message from the President of the United States, and sundry accompanying documents, in the case of the Danish brigantine called the Henrick, have leave to report thereon by bill, or bills, or otherwise.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the same committee, reported a bill to enable the President of the United States to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brigantine called the Henrick; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-day.

Mr. RANDOLPH from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed by a resolution of this House of the twenty-eighth ultimo, "to inquire into the expediency of suspending, for a limited time, the collection of all debts or duties due to the United States from the citizens of the States of Tennessee, Ohio, and Kentucky, and the citizens of the Indiana and Mississippi Territory, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States,' and to the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage,' with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand eight hundred and three," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill for settling sundry claims to the public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee was read the third time: Whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, that the farther consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships and vessels of the United States,' and to the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage:'" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand eight hundred and three:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

An engrossed bill for reducing the marine corps was read a third time, and, on the question of its passage, Mr. HUGER moved its postponement to the first Monday in November; which motion was lost—ayes 32, noes 40.

Mr. THATCHER then spoke against the passage of the bill.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 45, noes 35.

Mr. J. C. SMITH, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill enabling the President to make such restitution as he may deem proper to the owners of the Danish brig Hendrick, and appropriating $40,000 for that purpose.

The House went into a Committee on the bill.

Mr. BAYARD declared himself, from the want of information, unprepared to vote on the bill.

Messrs. J. C. SMITH and RANDOLPH replied, and defended the bill.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment.

The House immediately took up the report.

Mr. BAYARD moved to postpone it till the first Monday in November.

This motion was supported by Messrs. BAYARD, DAVIS, GRISWOLD, DANA, and EUSTIS; and opposed by Messrs. J. C. SMITH, S. SMITH, and RANDOLPH.

The motion was lost—ayes 24, noes 35.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow—ayes 38.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HOLLAND said he wished to state to the House some circumstances which were important to himself, however unimportant they might be to the public. It would be recollected that he had some days since obtained leave of absence after this day for the remainder of the session. On Saturday evening he was informed that it had been insinuated that he had been guilty of an improper disclosure. Under this imputation he was not willing to leave the House. If any gentleman thought that he had committed such an act, he invited him then to bring forward the charge. He had been told that the manner in which the affair had been stated was this: that the disclosure was made in a letter which he had written to one of his constituents in North Carolina; and that the imputation rested on a letter in the hands of his colleague (Mr. HENDERSON.) That letter could be produced; and if any gentleman gave credit to the charge, he wished it to be produced immediately, that he might not go home under any such imputation. He had not indeed expected that any such imputation, founded on a disposition to disclose the confidential proceedings of the House, would have been laid to one of the majority. He did suppose if there should be any disclosure, it would come from another quarter. He however, solicited any gentleman to bring forward the charge who professed to believe it. This was a debt of justice due to him and to the House: and if were not done, he would not consider the gentleman who had made it as believing it himself.

Mr. GRISWOLD said it ought to be known to the House, that the colleague of the gentleman (Mr. HENDERSON) had been and still was confined by sickness. He regretted under those circumstances that the gentleman had not waited until his colleague attended in his place.

Mr. HOLLAND said he meant not to cast any imputation on his colleague; he had not subjected himself to the least obloquy. If he was in possession of the letter it was in the power of gentlemen to obtain it.

CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill concerning the City of Washington, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill allows an annual salary of $1,200 to the superintendent, three dollars per day to the surveyor, and provides for clerk-hire and contingent expenses in these offices.

Mr. RANDOLPH suggested to the gentleman from New York the propriety of introducing into this bill such provisions as he thought proper, and had some time since alluded to, respecting the necessary repairs to the public buildings.

Mr. MITCHELL made a few remarks on the necessity of making provision for the accommodation of the next Congress, in consequence of its augmented numbers, and for repairing several parts of the buildings now in a state of ruin and dilapidation; and concluded by saying he would prepare a new section to that effect.

Mr. DAWSON said he had prepared a new section of this nature, which he offered to the Chair, appropriating — dollars, to be applied under the direction of the President to the repair of the Capitol, for the future accommodation of Congress.

On the suggestion of Mr. ALSTON, the motion was varied so as to embrace the public buildings generally.

Mr. MERIWETHER thought the Committee were acting without proper information.

Mr. DAWSON observed that an estimate had been made.

Mr. BACON inquired what sum it was contemplated to appropriate.

Mr. BRENT said an estimate had been made by an eminent architect of the sum that would be required for putting the part of the Capitol, in which the House sat, in such a situation as to accommodate them. The estimate, he understood, was $40,000.

Mr. MORRIS asked if it was not intended to repair the other parts of the Capitol and the President's House, the roofs of which were, he understood, so leaky as to threaten both edifices with ruin?

Mr. DAWSON's motion was then agreed to—ayes 42.

Mr. BRENT moved to fill the blank with $50,000. Carried—ayes 40.

On motion of Mr. EUSTIS the above appropriation was made to embrace the keeping in repair of the highway between the Capitol and the President's House.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill with amendments; to which the House agreed, and ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading today.

TENNESSEE LANDS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for settling sundry claims to public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee.

The bill consists of eleven sections; the first three of which follow:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That every grant, deed, conveyance, or other written evidence of any claim or claims to any of the lands lying to the north of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, south of the State of Tennessee, east of the river Mississippi, and west of the western boundary of the State of Georgia, as the said boundary is described by the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and that State, derived, or pretended to be derived, from an act of the State of Georgia, passed on the seventh day of January, 1795, entitled "An act supplementary to an act for appropriating a part of the unlocated territory of this State, for the payment of the State troops, and for other purposes therein mentioned, and declaring the right of this State to the unappropriated territory thereof, for the protection and support of the frontiers of this State, and for other purposes therein mentioned," shall be exhibited to the Secretary of State within twelve months after the passing of this act, and there recorded in a book or books to be kept for that purpose, at the expense of the party exhibiting the same, who shall pay to the person employed by the Secretary of State for recording the same, at the rate of twelve and a half cents for every hundred words contained in each document thus recorded; nor shall any grant, deed, conveyance, or other written evidence of any claim derived, or pretended to be derived, from the said act of the State of Georgia, unless it shall have been exhibited and recorded in the manner and within the time above specified, ever after be admitted or considered as evidence in any of the courts of the United States, against any other grant from the State of Georgia, or from the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the five millions of acres reserved by the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, as shall not, during the present session of Congress, have been appropriated for satisfying claims other than those described in the preceding section, to any of the lands above mentioned, or so much of the net proceedings thereof as may be necessary for that purpose, shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the purpose of indemnifying for, and extinguishing the claims or pretended claims to any of the lands above mentioned, which are derived, or pretended to be derived, from the above mentioned act of the State of Georgia.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the several companies, or persons claiming under them, designated in the said act of the State of Georgia, by the names of "Georgia Company," "Georgia Mississippi Company," "Tennessee Company," and "Upper Mississippi Company," shall, upon making such a release of the whole of their respective claim or claims, in favor of the United States, as shall be approved of by the Attorney General for the time being, be entitled to receive grants for the amount of land appropriated by the next preceding section of this act: Provided, however, That the same grant shall be located with the approbation of the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being, on lands to which the Indian title has not yet been extinguished, in no more than six tracts; that is to say, three tracts for the persons claiming under the Georgia Company, and one tract for each of the other companies, or the persons claiming under them respectively, each of which tracts shall extend the whole length or breadth of the territory claimed by the respective companies, and shall not have a greater proportionate tract on the rivers than the territory thus claimed.

Mr. HUGER moved an amendment, the object of which was to place the South Carolina Yazoo Company on the same footing with the other claimants.

This motion was supported by Messrs. HUGER and BAYARD, and opposed by Messrs. NICHOLSON and MERIWETHER; and was lost—ayes 18.

Mr. MERIWETHER then moved a new section in lieu of the third section; directing the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, to receive such propositions as may be made by the claimants, and to make report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. NICHOLSON supported this motion.

Mr. EUSTIS moved an amendment authorizing the commissioners to make a final settlement of the claims.

Mr. NICHOLSON opposed the amendment.

Mr. GREGG was opposed not only to the amendment but to the bill itself.

Mr. MERIWETHER spoke against the amendment.

Mr. EUSTIS's amendment was lost without a division.

The new section offered by Mr. MERIWETHER was then adopted—ayes 42.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to strike out all the remaining sections, except the eleventh, which is as follows:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That nothing in 7th Con. 2d Ses.—20 this act contained shall be construed to recognise, impair, or affect the claims of any person or persons to any of the lands above mentioned.

Carried without a division.

The Committee rose, and the House immediately concurred in their amendments.

Mr. HUGER renewed the motion which he had made in Committee, on which a debate ensued in which Messrs. HUGER and BAYARD supported, and Messrs. NICHOLSON and MERIWETHER opposed it.

Mr. DAVIS moved the recommitment of the bill to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NICHOLSON opposed the motion; which was lost—ayes 15.

The question was then taken on Mr. HUGER's amendment, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 36—noes 21.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day—ayes 49.

TUESDAY, March 1.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill concerning the City of Washington was read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia:" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said amendments, together with the bill, be committed to Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. TALIAFERRO, and Mr. HUNT.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

According to the request stated in your resolution of December 20th, I communicated to you such returns of the militia of the different States as had then been received. Since that date, returns have been received from New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, North Carolina, Georgia, and Kentucky, which are now transmitted to you.

MARCH 1, 1803.

THOS. JEFFERSON.

The said Message was read, and, together with the statement transmitted therewith, ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the state of the direct tax, together with a letter to him, from the Commissioner of the Revenue, relative thereto, in pursuance of a resolution of this House of the 24th of January last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the bill to allow a drawback of duty on sugar refined within the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported the bill with several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to the farther consideration of an engrossed bill for settling sundry claims to public lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, which was yesterday read the third time: Whereupon, the question being taken that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 58, nays 12, as follows:

THE MINT.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prolong the continuance of the Mint at Philadelphia.

The bill provides for the continuance of the Mint for five years, and appropriates $500 beyond the usual appropriation for the establishment.

The appropriation was, on motion of Mr. VARNUM, struck out, without a division. The Committee then reported the bill.

The House concurred in the report.

Mr. ALSTON observed that if it were not so late in the session he would move to strike out the first section, by which the Mint would be abolished; but as it was too late to take this step, with any probability of success, he should content himself with moving to strike out five, and insert one, by which the institution would be continued for one year only.

Lost—ayes 25, nays 31.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

DANISH BRIG HENRICK.

An engrossed bill to enable the President to make restitution to the owners of the Danish brig Henrick, was read a third time.

Messrs. DAWSON, J. C. SMITH, GREGG, and S. SMITH, spoke in favor of, and Messrs. BAYARD, HASTINGS, GRISWOLD, BACON, DANA, and GODDARD, against the bill.

Mr. LEIB moved a postponement of the bill to the first Monday in December.

On which motion the yeas and nays were taken, and were—yeas 39, nays 39. The SPEAKER declared himself against the postponement.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and carried—yeas 41, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—Willis Alston, John Archer, Theodorus Bailey, Walter Bowie, Richard Brent, Samuel J. Varnum, Peleg Wadsworth, and Richard Winn.

The House adjourned until five o'clock, post meridian.

FIVE O'CLOCK, P. M.

An engrossed bill to prolong the continuance of the Mint at Philadelphia was read the third time, and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States during the Revolutionary war," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House."

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the time for the next meeting of Congress." The Committee reported the bill without amendment.

A motion was then made, and the question being put, that the farther consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow, it passed in the negative. And then the main question being taken that said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 42, nays 30, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, March 2.

An engrossed bill to allow a drawback of duty on sugar refined within the United States was read a third time and passed—yeas 36, nays 29.

The bill was supported by Messrs. MITCHELL, and S. SMITH; and opposed by Mr. MOTT.

Mr. RANDOLPH, from the committee to whom was referred a letter from William Henry Harrison, President of the Convention held at Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory, relative to the suspension of the sixth article of compact between the United States and the people of that Territory, (which prohibits slavery); also, a memorial and petition of the inhabitants of the Territory; made a report, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee to whom were referred the amendments of the Senate to an act for the relief of insolvent debtors within the District of Columbia, reported their agreement thereto; in which report the House concurred.

The House took into consideration the amendments of the Senate to the act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds received in the late service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war.

A motion was made to postpone the consideration of the bill to the first Monday of November, which was supported by Mr. JOHN C. SMITH, and opposed by Mr. HELMS. Lost—yeas 24, nays 38.

Mr. GRISWOLD moved the reference of the amendments to a select committee. Carried—yeas 35, nays 23; and referred to Messrs. HELMS, GRISWOLD, and EUSTIS.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial System of the United States,' with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

SINKING FUND.

Mr. GRISWOLD rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I hold in my hand a resolution which I attempted yesterday to submit to the consideration of the House, but was then prevented by a preference which it was thought proper to give to other business. To this resolution I beg leave, at this time, to call your attention, and I trust the importance of the subject which it involves, will induce gentlemen to give it a consideration. As I mentioned yesterday, the resolution proposes an investigation of the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, who received, in the course of the last year, more than ten millions of the public money to be applied to the discharge of the principal and interest of the public debt, but whose accounts have been rendered with so much uncertainty as to leave it doubtful whether the money has been applied or the law regarded. For the purpose of ascertaining whether this has been done, I propose to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to examine the report of the Commissioners, and to report to the House; and although I regret that so short a time will be allowed for examination, yet, when it is recollected that the report has already been several weeks before that committee, and no apparent progress has been made by them, I trust it will not be thought extraordinary, that I should endeavor, even at this late period of the session, to stimulate their investigation by new instructions.

It may be proper further to observe, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. RANDOLPH) has been long apprized of the objections which have been made to the report of the Commissioners, and, probably, has long since consulted with the acting officer of the board, and will be prepared to make a report. The Journals of the House will show that the Commissioners made their report on the seventh day of February, and it will be recollected that as soon as it was printed and laid on our tables, upon a motion which I had the honor, at that time, of submitting, the House referred the report to the Committee of Ways and Means; and the chairman of that committee will recollect that, on the same or the succeeding day, I stated to him the objections which appeared against the report. Under these circumstances, we may expect a report from the committee before the close of the session; but, even if this should not take place, it may be useful to call the particular attention of the members of the House to a subject which can be fully elucidated by calculations in the closet, and gentlemen will then be induced, at their leisure, to make the investigation for themselves. But, before I read the resolution in my place or offer it to the House, I will take the liberty of explaining the objects to which I think the attention of the committee ought to be particularly directed, and will point out some of the objections which arise, to the proceedings of the Commissioners and to their accounts.

The provisions of the law of the last session, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the whole public debt," cannot, I presume, be forgotten by the House. On this law it is necessary only to observe, that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were authorized to receive, in each year, from the revenue from impost and tonnage, a sum which, when added to the receipts from certain branches of the Sinking Fund, should form an aggregate of $7,300,000; and it was made the duty of the Commissioners to apply this sum "yearly and every year," to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt. The duty of the Commissioners has not only been thus clearly defined, but it is fresh in the recollection of every member of the House, that, in the discussion which took place on this floor upon the passage of the law in question, it was confidently asserted that the Commissioners would faithfully and literally execute the law, and that we might be assured that they would apply, in each year, the fund of $7,300,000 to the principal and interest of the debt. An examination of the report of the Commissioners will show how far these promises have been executed.

By the report, it appears that the Commissioners received, in the year 1802, the appropriation for that year, amounting, as already observed, to - - - - -	$7,300,000 00
But they have applied to the payment of the debt, from the foregoing fund, the following sums only; that is to say:
For interest on the whole debt for the year 1802 - - -	$4,065,738 47
For account of a debt due to the bank - -	2,400 00
For instalments of the Dutch debt, for the year 1802 - - -	1,344,000 00
For reimbursements of six per cent., and deferred stock, estimated at - - - - -	1,117,869 37
	<hr/> 6,530,207 84
Leaving a balance in their hands unapplied and unaccounted for, of - - -	769,992 16

I must be permitted again to repeat, that it was made expressly the duty of the Commissioners to apply, within the year, this fund of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars to the interest and principal of the debt, and to observe that it has not been done, if credit is to be given to their own report; and I hope the committee will, in their report, inform the House why the law has not been executed.

If it should be imagined by any gentleman present, that the payment made to the bank, from the sales of bank shares, may be considered as a payment from the fund of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, it will only be necessary for those gentlemen, if any such there be, to turn to the law, and to the report of the Commissioners; and they will be satisfied that the law could not warrant the Commissioners, nor have they claimed that the proceeds of those sales composed any part of the fund of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, but, on the contrary, have not only sold the bank shares and applied the proceeds to pay the bank, but have, in addition, claimed and received from the Treasury the whole sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, under the law of the last session, and without applying it, as has been already stated.

It can scarcely be necessary to observe, that the remittances which may have been made to Holland to meet the instalments of the Dutch debt for the current year, cannot be considered as a payment of debt in the year 1802, or as a legal application of any part of the fund of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, for the year 1802. For, as the law requires that the payment of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars shall be made in each year, a provision to meet an instalment falling due in a subsequent year, can be no payment within the year; and, as the fund of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars was actually received for the year 1802, it was clearly their duty to apply it within the year.

There are other parts of the report which require investigation, and to some of which I request the attention of the House. It will be found in page six of the report, that the Commissioners have charged $4,065,738 47, as a payment for the interest which accrued on the whole debt, for the year 1802. This charge may be correct, but it does not agree with the Treasury accounts, and there must be an error somewhere.

In the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the interest of the domestic debt, is stated to be - - - - -	$3,470,250 75
In the report of the Secretary of last year, the interest of the Dutch debt, for the year 1802, is - - - - -	476,931 00
Forming an aggregate of - - - - -	<hr/> 3,940,190 75

By comparing this aggregate with the charge of the Commissioners, it will be found, that their account of interest exceeds the Treasury account $148,547 79. It appeared to me probable, that the Secretary had made the mistake in stating the interest upon the domestic debt, and had, perhaps, omitted to charge the interest upon the debt due to the bank, which, as appears by the report of the Commissioners, amounted to $162,025. But when this sum is added to the aggregate of the Treasury account of interest, it will be found that the result exceeds the Commissioners' account by $43,477 28, so that this conjecture cannot explain the difficulty. The confusion and uncertainty which appears in the different accounts which relate to the interest of the debt is the more unfortunate, because we are not only prevented from knowing what the true amount of interest on each description of debt is, but are left in a state of uncertainty in relation to the aggregate of interest; and, of course, cannot say whether the Commissioners have charged too much or too little. The importance of receiving correct and detailed accounts of these large payments by the public agents, is too apparent to require any remark from me to impress its necessity on the House; and it is a circumstance which has surprised me as much as any other in this report, that, in a case which is attended with so little difficulty, the Commissioners, instead of stating in detail the interest upon each description of debt, as it was their duty to do; and in that way furnishing us with the means of pursuing their calculations, have only sent us a gross amount, disagreeing with the Treasury account, without furnishing a single datum from which we can ascertain the truth or falsehood of the charge. Before I close my remarks upon this part of the account, it may not be improper to notice, that the accounts of last year, in regard to the Dutch debt, did not agree with each other. In one part of the report of the Secretary, in the table marked P, the interest on the Dutch debt for the year 1802, is stated to be $476,931; and in the same report, in table R, the interest for the same period, is stated to be only 1,145,250 guilders, equal to $458,100. Nor will this disagreement be reconciled, by adding to the amount of interest in table R, the premium and commissions for 1802 upon the Dutch debt, and considering those charges as interest. Those commissions, &c., amounted to 59,577 guilders 10 stivers, equal to $23,831, and, if added to the interest, will produce an aggregate which exceeds the interest in table P, by $6,000. In short, it is impossible to examine this account of interest in any direction, without finding ourselves perplexed either by errors or uncertainties.

The general account of the Commissioners is liable to objections of a nature equally, if not more serious and important. It appears by the report that, in the year 1802, the Commissioners received, in cash, from the Treasury, the sum of - $9,372,752 28

Likewise an unexpended balance in Holland, at the close of the year 1801, and which came to their hands in 1802, two millions three hundred and thirteen thousand eight hundred and forty-six guilders nine stivers, equal to - 925,538 60

Forming an aggregate for which the Commissioners were bound to account, of - 10,293,290 88

By their own account, they have made the following payments; that is to say:

For interest on the public debt - - $4,065,738 47

For instalment of the foreign debt, and a debt due to the bank 2,634,000 00

For reimbursement of the six per cent. and deferred stock, estimated at - - 1,117,869 37

7,817,607 84

Which, deducted from the amount received, leaves a balance, for which no certain account has been rendered, of - - - $2,480,683 04

This statement has been made on the principle that the payments charged by the Commissioners were correct, but it remains uncertain whether they have been correct in any particular. The uncertainty in the interest account I have already noticed, and I will now observe that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the last year, does not agree with the present account in regard to the instalment of the foreign debt for the year 1802. It was stated by the Secretary last year, that this instalment amounted to 3,550,000 guilders. In this report, the same instalment is stated to be only 3,360,000 guilders. Which is right and which is wrong I know not—the two accounts differ 190,000 guilders. The reimbursement of the six per cent. and deferred stock has not been, I am inclined to think, stated correctly; but this the Secretary gives only as an estimate; and I shall pass it by without further remark.

But I proceed to make some farther remarks on the balance of $2,480,683 04, for which no certain account has been rendered.

It is true that the Commissioners say, that they purchased, and paid for, certain remittances to Holland before the 1st of January, 1803, and which remittances were to meet the instalments of the Dutch debt falling due in 1803, a sum, which they estimate at 5,914,606 guilders 10 stivers, equal to $2,365,842 60; but it will be remarked, that this is only an estimate, and it is left to the House to decide whether the disbursement of these millions of the public money is only to be accounted for on estimate. If the House is satisfied with this mode of accounting, I feel it my duty, as an individual, to enter my protest against such a procedure. Sir, upon such an account, it remains still uncertain whether one-half of the money has ever been remitted. The Commissioners estimate that they have remitted five millions of guilders; they might, with as much propriety, estimate that they had remitted ten millions; there is no certainty in the term, and we are left as much in the dark, in respect to the true state of the account, as if they had said nothing on the subject.

But why is this part of the account sent in on estimate? Can there be any necessity for this? Do not the accounts of the Commissioners show every cent which has been paid for these remittances? Do not these accounts show every cent which remains in the hands of agents for the purchase of bills? Why, then, are we put off with an estimate? Was it not an easy thing to have stated the amount of every bill which had been purchased, with the price paid, and the amount of every contract for placing money in Holland, and the periods of payment? Sir, all this might have been done, and we might then calculate for ourselves, whether these remittances amounted to five or six millions of guilders. We might then see the precise terms on which these remittances were procured. We might see who the individuals were with whom contracts were made, or from whom bills were purchased; and we might see how long these individuals were to use the public money before they are bound to place it in Holland. I ask again, why has not this been done? Gentlemen who are in the secrets of the Cabinet, I hope, will be prepared with an answer.

MARCH, 1803.

I do not undertake to say that any improper contracts have been made. Of these contracts I know nothing; but of this I am perfectly certain, that an individual who has the control of ten millions of public money may, without much danger of detection, oblige his confidential friends with large sums; and that the facility with which this may be done, is increased, by rendering an account finally upon estimate. Sir, from this mode of procedure, there may result a system of favoritism, highly prejudicial to the interest of the Treasury. Contracts may be made for placing money in Holland ten or twelve months hence, the money may be advanced at the time, and the favorite may have the use of it under the contracts for a year, without interest. Bills may be purchased, payable at a very distant day, and a contract entered into, that the bills shall not be presented for acceptance for three or four months after they have been drawn, or until the drawers are accommodated with funds derived from some mercantile adventure fitted out from the same advance. Sir, in this way, favorites may be supplied with a capital to trade upon, and Government will not only lose the interest of the money, but run the hazard of sinking the whole by the unfortunate result of a mercantile speculation. I do not know that anything of this kind has taken place, and I am far from making any charge of this nature against the Commissioners of the Sinking fund, or against the Secretary of the Treasury, who is the agent of the board, and personally accountable for the fairness of the transactions, and correctness of the accounts. But it is highly important that some better mode than that of estimate should be devised for rendering accounts of the expenditure of public money. It is important to the country, and it is important to the Commissioners themselves, against whom no suspicions ought to be entertained, if their conduct has been correct.

But, admitting this mode of accounting by estimate to be correct, and that we give the Commissioners credit for these guilders estimated to have been remitted to Holland, there will still remain in their hands the sum of $114,839 44, wholly unaccounted for. Sir, as the report stands, there is no way of accounting for this balance, but by conjecture; and this mode is, in my judgment, as correct as that by estimate. We may conjecture that the money remains with public agents, or in protested bills, as some allusions appear to be made in the report to agents and protested bills; but we are still compelled to conjecture that the amount in protested bills, if any, is extremely small, as the Treasury account has deducted the protested bills from the money advanced to the Sinking Fund, up to October, 1802, and charged the balance only. Sir, it would be improper for me to conjecture that this balance had been misapplied, for I certainly have no grounds on which to form such a conjecture, unless, indeed, the strange situation of these accounts should be considered as sufficient grounds for suspicion to rest upon. An investigation may, probably, clear up these difficulties, and the money may certainly be traced through all the channels through which it has passed.

I have considered it particularly the duty of every member of this House to examine, with vigilance, the accounts of the expenditure of public money, and more particularly to attend to those expenditures which take place under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury. Although the objects of these expenditures are designated by law, yet the magnitude of the sums and the small number of individuals who are admitted, from the nature of the business, to examine the particular contracts under which the money is advanced, necessarily leaves the expenditure, in many particulars, under fewer checks than any other branch of the service.

But I will detain you no longer with explanatory remarks, hoping that those which I have already made will induce the House to consider and to agree to the resolution which I now take the liberty of submitting, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire whether the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have, agreeably to the directions of the act, entitled "An act making provision for the redemption of the whole of the public debt of the United States," applied the sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars, provided by the same, to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt; and to inquire generally into the accounts and proceedings of the Sinking Fund, and to report to the House.

Mr. RANDOLPH said he rose to second the motion. The House would recollect that not longer since than yesterday, gentlemen, even those who generally acted together, persisted in differing (in the case of the brig Henrick, condemned in a West India court) whether the captor was plaintiff or defendant in the action; and this, after mutual explanation, and notwithstanding the copy of the record was before them. He mentioned this circumstance only to show how easy it was, in an assembly so large, to confound and perplex any matter of fact which had not been previously inquired into and settled by a select committee. How much more easy, then, to take exceptions to an account, and to puzzle the House with long and intricate calculations prepared for the occasion. It is not to be expected that he should accompany the gentleman from Connecticut through such a series of figures, nor could it be done with any benefit to the House. The professed object of the gentleman is inquiry. He has declared that he had no design to cast any imputation of misconduct on the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund; that he hoped they would be able to give a satisfactory explanation of those points on which he felt dissatisfied; and yet, said Mr. R., the observations of the gentleman would seem to be the effect of an unsatisfactory inquiry. If investigation alone were the object, wherefore delay it until now? Would not the regular and natural course of a substantial inquiry have been, to move a resolution to that effect—to have instructed the Committee of Ways and Means as to certain specific objects of investigation—and to have reserved observations which, whatever be their motive, do tend to impeach the conduct of the Administration, until the report of the committee could be made, in case it should prove unsatisfactory? The course which has been pursued, so far from leading to inquiry, seems eminently calculated to preclude or to stifle it. A motion is brought forward, on the eve of our dissolution, prefaced with observations calculated to excite much discussion, and to exhaust the little time that was left; and this inquiry, instead of being confined to one or two facts, embraced a great variety of intricate details.

Mr. R. said, that he would examine into some of the statements made respecting the application of the sum appropriated by the act of last session to the reduction of the debt. And here he could not but remark the coincidence of the unaccounted balance of one hundred and fourteen thousand some hundred dollars, stated by the gentleman, with the representations contained in a printed circular (of which he obtained a casual sight yesterday,) addressed by a gentleman from North Carolina to his constituents: although the writer of the letter did, and the gentleman from Connecticut did not, give credit for the proceeds of the sale of the bank shares.

[Here Mr. GRISWOLD said he was misunderstood—that, in making out the balance of one hundred and fourteen thousand dollars, he had given credit for the bank stock.]

Mr. R. proceeded. He said that the gentlemen then agreed, as indeed he supposed at first they would, not only in the result, but in all the intermediate steps which led to it. Whether the gentleman from Connecticut had availed himself of the labors of his friend, or had lent his assistance to him, he could not undertake to determine, but from the tenor of that letter, and of the objections which had just been offered, it was evident that the same master-hand had prompted both. It was, nevertheless, contended that the proceeds of the bank shares could not be estimated as a part of the appropriation of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars to the public debt. Mr. R. said, that the report of the Sinking Fund did not indeed include these proceeds in that sum, because the Commissioners construed the law so as to have the utmost efficiency to the appropriation, and to pay, of course, a larger sum towards the reduction of the debt. But it was perfectly clear that these shares were included in that appropriation. [Here Mr. R. read the first section of the law.] This appropriation is made out of so much of the duties on imports and tonnage as, together with the moneys which now constitute the Sinking Fund (surpluses of revenue excepted) will amount to seven millions three hundred thousand dollars; and by the act of the 31st May, 1796, the power to sell those shares is expressly given to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund—and they have been, accordingly, sold and applied to the purposes directed by that act. Those shares then did, when the appropriation was made, constitute a part of the Sinking Fund, and were what remained of five thousand shares, two thousand seven hundred and eighty having been sold under the act of May, 1796, by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund. It is evident, then, that the Sinking Fund might take credit for the sum produced by the sale of that stock, as a part of the sum of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars. But exclusively of it, Mr. R. said, it could easily be proved that more than the amount appropriated had been disbursed on account of the debt. The items consisted, if gentlemen would turn to the report, 1st. Of disbursements on account of the interest of the whole debt; 2d. On account of the principal, viz., the Bank and Dutch debts, and the 8th and 2d instalments of the old and deferred six per cent., respectively, payable first of January, 1803; 3d. The excess of guilders on hand, applicable to the payment of the Dutch debt falling due in the year 1803, after deducting the guilders on hand at the close of the year 1800, which were applicable to the payment of that debt falling due in the year 1802. This excess, amounting to more than three millions six hundred thousand guilders, for which the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund must have credit, having debited themselves for the amount on hand at the commencement of the year, will, after deducting the million two hundred and eighty-seven thousand six hundred dollars produced by the sale of the Bank shares, amount to somewhat more than eight millions of dollars, or seven hundred thousand dollars (exclusive of the proceeds of the Bank stock) more than the Commissioners were bound to pay.*

But the gentleman from Connecticut has said, that no credit should be given in the year 1802, for any payments made in the year 1803. He would strike out, therefore, the three millions six hundred thousand guilders, from which credit is taken; since, according to him, credit may be as well taken for moneys to be paid six years hence as during the next year; and yet he gives credit for the reimbursement of the six per cent. and deferred stock payable on the first of January, 1803. Let not the House ascribe this to the generosity of the gentleman; he knew that if credit was not given for the eighth and second instalments of those stocks payable on the first of January, 1803, credit must be taken for the payment of the seventh and first instalments of the subscription loan due the bank, paid the first January, 1802, amounting to one hundred and sixty thousand dollars more than the sum which he has admitted. He knew that one or the other of those payments must be credited, and he has taken the smallest, although upon his own principle, being payable in 1803, it ought not to be admitted in advance. An objection is, however, made to allowing credit for the guilders in advance for paying the Dutch debt falling due in the course of the present year. The gentleman seems to rely upon a construction which he gives to the law of the last session, and contends that it was the duty of the Commissioners to pay, for interest and principal of the debt, the whole amount of seven millions three hundred thousand dollars within the year 1802. Out of what fund did he suppose the necessary advances were to be made for the Dutch debt falling due this year, if they were bound to pay the whole appropriation within the year 1802, and the purchase of bills to meet the debt in Holland in 1803, was not considered as a payment under the provision of the law? The gentleman knows, as does every member of the House, that provision must be made at least six months beforehand to meet that debt. All our estimates tell us so; all the calculations of the Treasury are bottomed upon it; those to which he has referred expressly say so; at this time we are nine months in advance, and yet he would construe the law so as to prevent the Commissioners from making the provision. The law explicitly directs them to make good the engagements of the public, in the first place, out of the appropriation, and the surplus, after having done so, is applicable at their discretion. But, upon his construction, the public engagements would be broken. The Commissioners would fail to perform a duty where no discretion is left them, and where the law allows a discretionary exercise of their power, there, it seems, they would have none. Mr. R. said, that it appeared to him the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund had given a tolerable liberal construction to the law which was passed in April, by paying nine millions three hundred thousand dollars in the course of that year, if the bank stock were included, and eight millions if it were not. Previous provision being necessary for the Dutch debt, the Commissioners had taken credit for the last six months of 1802 and the first six months of 1803, instead of twelve months in the year 1802. But if the construction given to the law shall exclude the last period, credit must be given for the payments made in the first six months of 1802. For, if it be said that this payment was made out of the bills purchased in 1801, and those bills are charged in the year 1801, although provided for 1802, certainly the bills provided in 1802, for the payment due in 1803, must also be credited in the year during which they were purchased. If this credit is to be given when the bills are purchased, then this sum of three millions six hundred thousand guilders must be allowed. But if credit is, on the other hand, to be given, not at the time of purchase, but when the bills are paid in Holland, then gentlemen must give credit for the payments made in the first six months of 1802. And wherefore should not these guilders, purchased in 1802, be applicable in 1803, and credited to the year 1802, as well as the reimbursement of the six per cent. and deferred stocks, payable on the first of January, 1803, be credited, as admitted by the gentleman from Connecticut, to the year 1802?

Mr. R. said, he would notice the objection that the sum of nine millions nine hundred and fourteen thousand six hundred and six guilders, mentioned in the seventh page of the report, was upon estimate. The report was dated on the third of February, 1803, purchases had been made from Savannah to Portland, and could it be expected that all the accounts of the agents for making those purchases were even received, much less settled, between the first of January, 1803, to which period the estimate refers, and the third of the next month?

These bills, moreover, being applicable to the debt falling due in Holland during the present year, until an account is received of the sum actually applied, specifying the amount of protested bills and this amount shall have been settled at the Treasury, the exact sum cannot be stated; but, although an estimate, it cannot properly be called a loose estimate, as it has been termed.

With respect to the one hundred and fourteen thousand and some hundred dollars said to be unaccounted for, this must be the sundry protested bills and unexpended balances in the hands of agents, specified in the report. So far from finding cause of surprise and suspicion at such an unaccounted balance, he was astonished that, including protested bills and advances to agents yet to be recovered or accounted for, so small a sum should appear unaccounted for, on the payment of nine millions three hundred thousand dollars, the sum disbursed, inclusive of the bank stock. The purchasers of bills for Government are the cashiers of the several banks. Some of these institutions are precluded by their charters—the Bank of the United States, for example—from making any advance beyond a small amount to Government, unless expressly authorized by a positive law. Advances must be made, therefore, to their cashiers, and, although the money may remain in bank, which is effectively the public treasury, although, substantially, not a dollar has been removed, yet, lying at the order of the cashiers to enable them to make purchasers from time to time, it is considered as advances to them. Gentlemen have complained of the unfairness of considering any department as debtor to the amount of advance made to it, because the accounts have not been settled, although every shilling may have been fairly paid for the public service; yet this is what they are now doing.

Mr. R. said, that he had no doubt that the money stated to have been paid, had been actually disbursed, because he had all the evidence which the case admitted. When he read a law he could not undertake to answer that the printed copy corresponded, verbatim, with that passed by Congress. The Committee of Enrolment, and those who collated the printed laws, must be relied upon for that. But wishing to give every attainable satisfaction to the House and the public, he hoped the resolution would pass, and he gave notice that, in case it did meet the approbation of the House, he should immediately move for leave for the Committee of Ways and Means to sit during the sitting of the House, and, if granted, would convoke them immediately, that the chairman might put his hand to any letter which the mover of the resolution should devise, and that the Secretary of the Treasury might be enabled to furnish all the information attainable at this period.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, he would beg the indulgence of the House while he offered a few remarks. These he would have thought totally unnecessary, if the observations of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GRISWOLD) had not been of a nature calculated to make an improper impression abroad. Whether it was the object of the gentleman, by postponing his motion to so late a period of the session, to preclude inquiry altogether, and thereby to induce a belief that he had given a fair statement of the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, he should not now undertake to determine; but he would say that there was strong ground to believe that this was his object. If inquiry, and inquiry alone was his object, why not lay the resolution on the table, and suffer it immediately to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, in order that inquiry might be made? Why accompany it with observations calculated only to excite a belief that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have been guilty of the grossest misconduct?

Through the various calculations which the gentleman had gone, in order to show an erroneous statement of the interest on the debt, it was impossible to follow him; nor was there time to make statements in the House, to meet those which the gentleman had prepared at his leisure in his closet. He should leave this, therefore, for the Committee of Ways and Means when the resolution came before them, and he ventured, without hesitation, to predict, that the error would be found on the side of the member from Connecticut. This part of the subject, therefore, he would leave to future investigation, and proceed directly to the two great points which seemed to be the gentleman's favorites, and upon which he appeared to expect to make the strongest impression.

These were, first, that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund had not applied the whole sum of $7,300,000, agreeably to the law of the last session; and, secondly, that there was a deficiency of one hundred and fourteen thousand dollars against the Commissioners, which they had not accounted for. On the first point he would endeavor to show that much more than the sum of $7,300,000 had been applied agreeably to law. In the sixth page of the report of the Commissioners, they state their disbursements to have been applied:

1802. accrued on the whole of the public debt, amounting to	$4,065,738 47
2. To the payment of the principal of the Dutch debt	1,344,000 00
3. Advanced to Commissioners of Loans, for the reimbursement of the eighth instalment of the six per cent. stock, the second instalment of the deferred stock, due January 1, 1803	1,117,869 37
4. To pay temporary loans from the bank, (exclusive of the proceeds of the Bank shares)	2,400 00
5. Debts due to foreign officers	7,994 92
6. On account of certain parts of the domestic debt	14,966 84
7. Advanced to purchase bills in Holland, to meet that part of the Dutch debt which falls due in the first of the year 1803, to the amount of 3,600,760 guilders, at 41 cents to the guilder	1,476,311 60

Making in the whole paid on account of the debt - 8,029,281 20
Or $729,000 more than was actually required.

The four first items in this statement the gentleman from Connecticut admits as having been applied agreeably to law, and they amount to $7,530,000 84; the fifth and sixth he took no notice of; but the seventh, he combated with all his energy, in order to show that it was not a proper charge upon the fund of $7,300,000. Let us, then, examine this question, and see whether the gentleman's position is correct, that the whole sum of $7,300,000 is to be applied to the discharge of debt due in any one year. The first section of the act of the last session provides "that the sum of $7,300,000 shall be appropriated to the Sinking Fund yearly, to be applied to the payment of interest and charges, and to the reimbursement and redemption of the principal of the public debt," and, in the same section, there is a proviso, "that after the whole of the said debt (except the six per cent. stock, the deferred stock, the 1796 six per cent. stock, and the three per cent. stock) shall have been reimbursed or redeemed, any balance of the sums annually appropriated by this act remaining unexpended at the expiration of six months next succeeding the end of the calendar year to which such annual appropriation refers, shall be carried to the surplus fund." Now, sir, I beg leave to ask if this proviso contemplates that the whole sum of seven million three hundred thousand dollars shall be applied to the discharge of debts actually due (though not payable) in any one calendar year; or, in other words, between the first day of January and the 31st of December? Does it not suppose that a balance of the seven million three hundred thousand dollars may remain in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, at the expiration of the year; and does it not provide, that after certain species of debts are extinguished, that such balance shall go to the surplus fund at the expiration of six months after the end of the year? If the construction of the gentleman is correct, the proviso is absurd; it is a perfect nullity in itself. The proviso, in fact, does suppose that a balance of the $7,300,000 may remain after discharging all the demands which can be made against the United States in any one year, and does leave that balance in the hands of the Commissioners, to be applied in such manner as they think proper, until the whole debt is extinguished, except those kinds which have just been mentioned. What then, sir, has been the conduct of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund? They have reimbursed all the principal both of the foreign and domestic debt, which was payable in the year 1802; they have paid all the interest which was due in that year, the two amounting to $6,552,970 60; and finding a balance in their hands after discharging all the demands against the Government, which could be made for that year, they have applied that balance, amounting to $749,019 40, together with the further sum of $729,282 20, to the purchase of bills of exchange on Holland, in order to meet the debt of the next year. In order further to show that this was the intention of the law, it may be well to refer to the documents of the last year, upon which the law was passed. It has been already seen that the legal demands against the Government for 1802 could not exceed the sum of $6,552,970 60, yet it was deemed expedient to appropriate the sum of $7,300,000, or $747,019 40 more than the amount of the demand. Will any gentleman now be so obliging as to inform me why this excess of appropriation was made? Sir, the reason is plain and obvious. It was, that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund might, in each year, have in their hands such a sum, after discharging all legal demands against the Government for that year, as would enable them to make the necessary advances to meet the Dutch debt in the next year, in case the state of the Treasury should not authorize the disbursement of more money under the second section of the act. To prove that this was the idea at the time, I beg gentlemen to refer to the statement (R) accompanying the report of the Secretary of the Treasury last year; upon which it will be acknowledged that this law was passed.

This statement (R) shows, in the sixth column, "the total amounts in dollars to be provided each year in America, in order to meet the payments in Holland." It states that, in 1801, the sum of $950,965 50 had been remitted to Holland to meet the debt due there in 1802, and it likewise states that the sum of $2,271,692 would be required for the year 1802. These two sums added together make an aggregate of three million two hundred and twenty-two thousand three hundred and eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents, or about one million three hundred thousand dollars more than the United States were bound to pay in Holland in the year 1802. This sixth column of the statement (R) is transferred to the statement (S) where it forms the second column, and clearly proves that the excess of appropriation was intended to enable the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to apply the balance of the 7,300,000 dollars to the purchase of bills of exchange in the antecedent year, to meet the demands for the subsequent year. Further to prove that this was the intention of the law, it may not be amiss to state that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the last year, before alluded to, calculates upon an amount of revenue equal to about $10,000,000.

Deduct from the expenses of Government equal to -	$2,660,000
And the annual appropriation of -	7,300,000
	9,960,000

Which sum of nine million nine hundred and sixty thousand deducted from the ten millions of dollars, the annual revenue, would leave only to be paid in bills to meet the debt in Holland in each succeeding year -	40,000
	$10,000,000

How far it would have been prudent to have placed the affairs of Government in this situation, I leave it for gentlemen to determine. This last calculation is not made to prove the necessity of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund having applied this balance in this way at this particular period, but to show the real intention in passing the law. It is possible that this balance might have been expended in purchasing the stock of the United States, and a sufficient sum might have been drawn out of the Treasury to meet the debt in Holland for 1803; but this was a matter of discretion with the Commissioners, and they have thought it more advantageous to employ the money in purchasing bills than in purchasing stock. The whole sum of seven million three hundred thousand dollars, and considerably more, has been applied to the payment of the debt; and after paying all we were obliged to pay, the Commissioners used their discretion in applying the balance to such particular kinds of debt, as they thought it would be best to provide for at that time.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the second point of the gentleman from Connecticut, and on which he has dwelt with great force, viz: that there is in the hands of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund an unaccounted balance of more than one hundred and fourteen thousand dollars. The gentleman has taken up this idea from the circumstance of his not being able to make the first and second statement on the sixth page of the report of the Commissioners quadrate with each other. I must beg leave to premise that it appears from the face of the report, that the Commissioners themselves did not intend that these two statements should quadrate: for it will be found, by recurring to them, that the second statement is not added up; that nearly six millions of guilders, mentioned in the last paragraph of the report, are not carried to the statement, and that they refer to sundry protested bills of exchange, and unexpended balances in the hands of agents, which are all to be carried to their credit against the first statement. I will show that the gentleman from

H. or R.

Connecticut, in his calculations, has not given the Commissioners the credit that they are entitled to; that he has given them no credit for sums appearing from the face of the report itself to have been paid; that he has given them no credit for the advanced prices of bills of exchange—he calculating at forty cents the guilder, instead of forty-one, which is the average price at which purchases have been made, as appears from the report; that he has given them no credit for protested bills of exchange, which indeed he supposes can amount to little or nothing; and that he has given them no credit for unexpended balances in the hands of agents, although they expressly state that such balances do exist. They exist, sir, from this cause: In order to purchase such bills of exchange as are required for the use of the Government, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund find it necessary to authorize the cashiers of the several banks to make the purchase for them. Some of these contract for the bills, and wait until they get a check for the amount upon their respective banks, where the money of the United States is lodged; but this is not the case with all; for there are some who will not make the purchases unless the money is previously deposited to their credit in the bank. Of course, it is necessary to make advances at different periods, which are usually made to the amount of fifty thousand dollars at a time. It follows that there is an account current between the Commissioners and the cashiers, which perhaps is settled once or twice a year. When the report was made on the fifth of February, these accounts were not settled, nor is it to be expected that they can always be in such a state as to enable the Treasury officers to say, at any moment, how much there is in the hands of a particular agent unexpended.

Mr. N. said he would now offer a statement to meet that of the gentleman from Connecticut, from which he flattered himself he should be enabled to show, that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were entitled, not only to a credit equal to the $114,000 mentioned by the gentleman, but to a credit which would considerably exceed it in amount.

The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, in their report, state the disbursements from the Treasury, in the year 1802, to have amounted to the sum of - - - $9,372,752 28

To which is to be added a balance of 2,313,846 guilders, remaining unexpended Jan. 1, 1802, equal to 928,539 40

Making an aggregate chargeable to them for 1802, of - - - $10,298,290 68

They are to be credited as follows:

1. For the payment of interest, which, in the year 1802, accrued on the whole of the public debt, in the report, not denied - $4,065,738 47
2. For the payment of the bank debt, including the proceeds of the 2,220 bank shares, $2,400, paid from impost duties, together 1,290,000 00

3. For payment of the principal of the Dutch debt, not denied 1,344,000 00
4. For the provision necessary for the reimbursement of the 8th instalment of the six per cent. stock, and the second instalment of the deferred stock, becoming payable January 1, 1803, not denied - - - 1,117,869 37
5. For the money laid out in the purchase of bills of exchange to the amount of 5,914,606 guilders, calculated by Mr. GRISWOLD at forty cents to the guilder, equal to - - - 2,365,842 40

Which several sums, added together, give the amount of credits admitted by the gentleman from Connecticut - - - $10,183,450 24

Leaving the balance of $114,840 44 cents yet to be accounted for, and which the gentleman from Connecticut declares that he cannot account for. Mr. N. said he would endeavor to assist him, and he believed he could show that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were entitled to a credit even for a greater sum. In the first place, the gentleman from Connecticut has not given credit for two items, stated in the report to have been paid, and which were paid, as follows, viz:

On account of debts due to foreign officers - - - $7,994 92

On account of certain parts of the domestic debt - - - 14,996 84

On account of the difference in the price of exchange, Mr. GRISWOLD calculating 5,914,606 guilders at forty cents each, whereas they really cost, at the least, forty-one cents the guilder, making a difference of one cent the guilder, equal to - - - 59,146 00

One bill of exchange drawn by a house in Baltimore, which, Mr. N. said he knew had come back protested, and for which the endorsers had not repaid the money to the United States, amounting to one hundred and twenty thousand guilders, which, even at par, were equal to forty-eight thousand dollars - - - 48,000 00

An unexpended balance in the hands of the cashiers of the banks at Philadelphia and Boston, which, considering the large advances made, might be fairly estimated at not less than - - - 10,000 00

Making, altogether, the sum of $140,107 82

Which the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund are entitled to a credit for, more than the gentleman from Connecticut is willing to allow them, and $25,267 38 more than the supposed deficiency of $114,840 44, which has been dwelt on so triumphantly to-day.

From this view, which I have taken of the subject as briefly as I could, I venture to indulge a hope, that it will be seen that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have applied, not only the seven million three hundred thousand dollars, agreeably to law, but a considerably larger sum; and that no impression will be made, even upon their greatest enemies, that they hold a single dollar unaccounted for. As the time of the House is, particularly at this period, extremely precious, I will not venture to trespass on it further, but shall most cheerfully give my assent to the resolution, under the fullest conviction that every objection can be fully answered, even during the present session of Congress, although it can continue but one day longer.

Mr. S. SMITH said, there was nothing in which gentlemen would be more frequently or grossly mistaken than in taking up accounts of the nature of those before the House, and attempting hastily to judge on them. It is to be regretted that this inquiry was not earlier brought forward, when it might have resulted in a fair decision, drawn from a full view of the subject. But when, at so late an hour, the gentleman has seen fit to bring forward his motion, and the documents on which we are to decide are packed up in our trunks, it will not be extraordinary that I am unable to follow. But for one or two remarks of the gentleman, I should not have thought it necessary to make the least reply. My only astonishment is that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) and my colleague (Mr. NICHOLSON) have been able off-hand to answer so effectually the objections that have been raised.

The gentleman says, the Commissioners ought not to have given us an estimate, when they could have stated the precise sums disbursed. So far as they could furnish a statement of precise sums they have done it. But in some cases they could not, as the thing was impossible. The Commissioners say, "that, besides the above-mentioned reimbursements and payments, there remained, at the close of the year 1802, exclusively of the amount of sundry protested bills still outstanding and of unexpended balances in the hands of agents, an unapplied balance, estimated at 5,914,600 guilders, applicable," &c. If they had said estimated at dollars, the objection might hold, but they say guilders. These are purchased in bills of exchange on Amsterdam; and, so far, they are explicit; or bills are bought on London in sterling money, and the proceeds of those bills are to be laid out in the purchase of bills on Amsterdam, which are in guilders, and which can only be stated by estimate. This part of the business, then, can only be ascertained by calculation; and where is the injury? At the next session, what is now an estimate will be a precise statement. So much for this objection. The Commissioners were not competent to furnish any other than estimate.

The gentleman further observes that the names of those to whom the bills have been sold ought to have been brought forward, to enable gentlemen to determine whether, in these transactions, there has not been some favoritism. But, at this time, this would be highly improper. The fit time will come at the next session of Congress.

The gentleman has taken a retrospective view of the payments made by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respecting the foreign debt. To remit the instalments, as they became due, has always been attended with great difficulty. Mr. Wolcott, a former Secretary of the Treasury, found it, in his time, extremely difficult to remit to Amsterdam. He did me the honor to converse with me on the subject. I pointed out a mode, which he adopted. He was able to buy bills on London, but not on Amsterdam; but to have done this would have been a losing game. The merchants brought to him a cargo, which, it was estimated, would in Amsterdam produce a certain sum. He agreed to advance two-thirds of this sum on the merchants' consigning the property to our agent at Amsterdam; and to pay the remaining third on receiving advice that the amount of debt, contracted to be paid, was discharged. Could the Secretary have spent the amount of this money in Amsterdam? Nobody ever doubted that the transaction was a proper one. There was then a confidence in the Government, and there must still be a confidence in the Government.

Subsequent to that period, the trade to Amsterdam has increased, in consequence of the war, by which our merchants, who have debts there to pay, are enabled to buy bills. But, on the cessation of hostilities, this facility, in a great measure, ceased. Another mode, therefore, was to be pursued, to make the necessary remittance for the payment of the public debt. In the year 1802 the Secretary found it difficult to remit; he was asked forty-two cents per guilder; for the merchants, and my house, among the rest, held out; they thought they had the Secretary in their power, knowing that he must, at all events, remit to a large amount, and they would have got the better of him, but for his judicious sale of the bank shares. He thereby compelled us to sell out, and saved to the United States $58,000, and compelled the merchants to sell for forty-one cents the guilder. If he had not done so, I should have got forty-two cents a guilder for my bills; for that was the proportion that bills on Amsterdam then bore to bills on London. But by taking the demand from the market, he reduced their value.

Since the beginning of the year 1802, one million nine hundred thousand dollars have been required to be remitted to Holland. The Secretary again found difficulty from the high exchange required. I understand that he has made a judicious contract, and with gentlemen, too, who are not favorites; a contract which I should not have been willing to make, by which means he has been enabled to obtain exchange at 41 cents the guilder. It is true, the merchant gets the money now, and makes the payment in September. He appears, at first view, to gain the interest for the intervening period, but this is not the fact, as he sells the bills proportionably lower; and Government loses nothing, as the money, if remitted, would be useless in Holland. In all this there is no favoritism. For the Secretary places his terms in the banks, and every merchant of credit may buy; all who have the means may participate; it is an affair of public notoriety.

Mr. S. concluded by observing that, though this subject had never before come to his view, he thought it best to throw out those few remarks in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GRISWOLD said, that he should not have troubled the House with any further remarks on the resolution which he had offered, as there appeared to be a disposition in gentlemen to adopt it, had it not been for some allusions which had been made by the three gentlemen who had been up, to the time of bringing the resolution into the House. He had been accused by those gentlemen of introducing his motion at the heel of the session, when sufficient time did not remain for a full investigation. These remarks, he thought, required an answer.

I did expect, said Mr. G., that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) would, in justice to me, have stated the circumstances which preceded the bringing forward the resolution; but, since that gentleman has not thought proper to do it, I will state those circumstances myself, and, as the gentleman is present, he will correct me if I commit an error.

The Journals of the House show that the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund was transmitted to the Legislature on the seventh of February. The report was not read in this House, but ordered to be printed, and, in two or three days, appeared in a printed form on our tables. From a cursory view of the report, he found (to say no more of it) that it contained many errors, and required much explanation; and he then moved the reference to the Committee of Ways and Means, (of which committee the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. RANDOLPH, is chairman,) and he communicated verbally, on the same morning, the objections which he had discovered to the report. On the same or the following day he committed the objections which he then made, to writing, and delivered them to the gentleman from Virginia, with a request that he would confer with the Secretary of the Treasury (who was the acting and responsible officer of the Board of Commissioners) and, if possible, obtain from him a satisfactory explanation of the report. The gentleman from Virginia did accordingly, as he understood, confer with the Secretary, and, in a short time afterwards, gave to him certain explanations which were not satisfactory. He therefore informed the gentleman from Virginia, at that time, that he should move a resolution in the House for instructions to the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject. And, having drawn up a resolution, which was substantially the same with that on the table, he presented it to the gentleman from Virginia, for his information and approbation; and that gentleman made no objection to any part of the resolution, except to two words, which, at his request, he expunged.

[Mr. RANDOLPH inquired what words had been expunged at his request?]

Mr. GRISWOLD replied, that the resolution originally directed the Committee to inquire whether the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund had, "in fact," applied the fund of $7,300,000 to the payment of the debt? &c. The gentleman from Virginia thought the words "in fact" sounded harsh, and implied more than was intended, and proposed that they should be expunged. And, said Mr. G., I accordingly expunged them from the resolution. The reason why the motion has not been brought into the House before this day must, said Mr. G., be well understood to have resulted from the press of other business. Many gentlemen who sit near me, can witness the frequent attempts which I have made, for more than one week, to introduce it, and it is no longer ago than yesterday that I proposed it to the House, but was voted down. With how much propriety, then, I have been charged with an improper delay of the resolution, until the heel of the session, the House will decide.

Mr. G. further said, that he presumed the gentleman from Virginia had, several weeks ago, communicated to his friends and the Secretary of the Treasury the objections to the report, and that those gentlemen were, or ought to be, prepared to give every explanation of which the report was susceptible.

But, since I am up, said Mr. G., I will proceed to consider some of the observations which have been made, in answer to those which I had the honor of submitting upon this subject. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) supposes that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund have a right to claim that the payment of $1,287,600, made to the bank from the proceeds of the sale of the bank shares, was a payment from the fund of $7,300,000, and that the remittances made to Holland in 1802, to meet the instalment of the Dutch debt falling due in 1803, may also be considered as payments of the debt from the same fund for the year 1802; and that if either of these sums be added to the other payments, which are confessed to have been applied to the debt in 1802, it will be found that the whole fund of $7,300,000 was duly applied to the debt in that year. To these two claims, said Mr. G., I shall endeavor to give concise, but I trust satisfactory answers.

And, in the first place, I admit that, if the payment to the bank from the sales of the bank shares, is to be considered as a payment from the fund of $7,300,000, or if the remittances to Holland to meet the instalments of 1803, are to be considered as payments of the debt in 1802, then will it appear (supposing the estimate of remittances to be correct) that the Commissioners have applied the whole fund of $7,300,000 for 1802 to the debt in that year. But a slight attention to the documents and the law will prove that these claims are unfounded. The fund of $7,300,000 has been correctly stated by the Commissioners to have been drawn from the following sources, that is to say:

From the interest arising on the domestic debt transferred to the Commissioners	-	-	-	-	-	$326,449	92

From the payment of debts originating under the late Government -	888 79
From one dividend on the bank stock of December 31, 1801 -	33,960 00
From the sales of public lands -	179,575 52
From impost and tonnage -	6,759,125 77
	7,300,000 00

"Making in the whole," (to use the Commissioners words,) "the annual appropriation by law for the year 1802, under the act aforementioned." The act aforementioned, in the report, was the act to provide for the redemption of the whole public debt. By this statement it will appear that the Commissioners received the whole fund of $3,700,000 for the year 1802, exclusive of the bank shares, and of course were bound by law to apply, in that year, this fund to the payment of the principal and interest of the debt. The fund arising from the sale of the bank shares is not only altogether distinct from the fund in question, but is so considered by the Commissioners, in their report, as will be seen on page six of the report. It will likewise be seen on the same page, and on pages fourteen and fifteen of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of December last, that the bank shares were sold under pretence of a law of the 31st May, 1796, and that the proceeds of the sale, agreeably to the provisions of that law, were applied to pay a debt due to the bank, in the same year. So that the sale of the bank shares, and the application of the money, has nothing to do, either with the law of the last session for the redemption of the debt, or the fund of $7,300,000 which was received by the Commissioners under that law, as already observed. Indeed the Commissioners have not pretended that any such connexion exists; they have acknowledged that they received the $3,700,000 as a distinct fund; and I ask, why they have not applied it within the year, as the law requires, to the payment of the public debt?

The claim that the remittances to Holland to meet the instalments of the foreign debt falling due in 1803 are to be considered as payments of debt in 1802, is equally extraordinary. The law of the last session declares, that, "it shall be the duty of the Commissioners, to cause to be applied and paid, yearly and every year, this fund of $7,300,000 to the debt." The Commissioners in their report declared that they have received the fund for the year 1802, and their advocates on this floor say that they have applied the fund to the payment of the debt yearly, and in the year 1802, because they have made provision for paying a debt which falls due in 1803. Or, in other words, the Commissioners have drawn the money from the Treasury and now keep it in the hands of their agents, or in their own pockets, and honestly intend to apply it to the payment of the public debt at some future period, and this has been a payment and application of the money to the debt in the year 1802. This, said Mr. GRISWOLD, is a mere evasion of the law, and it is absurd to expect that such expositions will go down, either in this House or in the country. The law, said Mr. G., cannot be mistaken, and I did not believe that it would be misrepresented. The object of the law was to secure with certainty, the application of this fund of $7,300,000 in each year to the debt; and the law is so expressed as to define with perfect certainty the duty of the Commissioners. Now if it is a good execution of this law to provide only for the payment of debts in future years, your law is only made for the benefit of the acting officer of the Board of Commissioners; for, if a provision to meet a payment in the next year, is to be considered as a payment in the present year, a provision to meet a payment falling due ten years hence, on the same principle, is a good payment within the year; and the only effect of the law is, to place millions of the public money under the control of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, without interest, who, when called upon to know whether they have applied it to the debt within the year, have only to answer, that "the money has been well applied, for that it remains in their hands, or in the hands of their friends, to be delivered ten years hence to the public creditors, whose demands will then become due."

But gentlemen have said that the application of the $7,300,000 within the year was impossible, because the remittances to Holland must be made in advance, and the Commissioners were authorized to draw annually from the Treasury the sum of $7,300,000 only, and out of this sum they were bound to make seasonable provision for discharging the foreign debt of next year.

Mr. NICHOLSON said, if the gentleman alluded to him, he was incorrect. He had not said that the Commissioners could draw no more than $7,300,000; he said it was discretionary with the Secretary to permit a greater sum to be drawn or not. He was to judge whether the state of the Treasury would justify a larger draft.

Mr. GRISWOLD said he was willing to consider the case under the gentleman's explanation, as the result would be precisely the same. By the law so often referred to, respecting the public debt, in the second section of the law, it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to advance to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, all such payments as might be necessary to discharge any demands against the United States as should become due at such time and times as would enable the Commissioners punctually to comply with the public engagements. Admitting then a discretion is given to the Secretary, as extensive as contended by the gentleman from Maryland, (but which, by-the-by, is not the case in the point under consideration,) yet, as it is admitted that there remained more than $4,000,000 in the Treasury on the first day of October, 1802, I ask, why was not the sum which was wanted for the payments in Holland in 1803, advanced by the Secretary, under authority of that section of the law to which I have referred? If the Commissioners had demanded this advance, would the Secretary, in his discretion, with $4,000,000 lying dead, have dared to refuse it? The plea, therefore, of impe-rious necessity; cannot prevail. The law, in commanding terms, required that the whole fund should be applied within the year to the debt, and there was no necessity for breaking in upon it.

But gentlemen have also said that the Commissioners were not bound to apply the whole sum within the calendar year. It was sufficient if they applied it within twelve months from the passage of the law, and that might still be done. But, said, Mr. G., the Commissioners have already given the true construction to the law in their report, and the excuse now offered is at war with the report. The Commissioners say, in express terms, that they have received the fund of $7,300,000 for the year 1802—not for one year or twelve months from the passage of the law. The law required that the fund should be received in each year, and that it should be applied yearly and every year. Now, said Mr. G., what is to be understood by this? If the gentleman who offered this excuse does not understand the meaning, the Commissioners do, and they have declared in their report, that, although the law passed in May, they were authorized to receive the fund for the year 1802, and having received it, it is for the House to declare whether they were not bound to apply it in the same year.

Some remarks, said Mr. G., have been made by a gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. NICHOLSON,) to prove that the balance of $114,839 44, which appeared to be entirely unaccounted for in the Commissioners' report, might hereafter be explained, and a satisfactory account rendered for the same. What will appear hereafter, said Mr. G., I cannot say, I speak only of what appears at this time. But the gentleman from Maryland has said, that money remains in the hands of agents, and to his knowledge there is a sum still remaining in protested bills. This may be the case, or the gentleman may be mistaken; but if it is the case, why in the name of common sense and common honesty has it not been stated in the report? If this had been done, we might determine for ourselves how far the deficiency was covered. The gentleman from Maryland, however, has said that $7,994 92 has been paid to foreign officers, and $14,966 84 for certain parts of the domestic debt, which were not included in the statements which I submitted to the House; and that these payments appear in the first statement, on page six of the Commissioners' report. If, said Mr. G., the gentleman from Maryland will re-examine the statement to which he refers, he will find that he has taken the debtor side of the account, and carried it to the credit of the Commissioners. The gentleman will find that the two sums of $7,994 92 and $14,966 84, are only disbursements from the Treasury to the Commissioners, to enable them to discharge a debt due to foreign officers, and to discharge certain portions of the domestic debt, which, said Mr. G., I suppose to be the registered debt, on which interest has for several years been stopped, and the principal ordered to be paid; and of course, that the Commissioners are at this time to be charged with these sums, and are not entitled to credit until they actually pay the same to the creditors. To convince the gentleman that I am right, I beg that he will look again at page six of the report. He will there find, at the top of the page, the account of all the disbursements from the Treasury in 1802, to the Commissioners, including the two sums which he has mentioned, and forming the aggregate of $9,372,752 28, for this aggregate, together with the unexpended balance of guilders in Holland at the close of the year 1801. The Commissioners are accountable, and ought to be charged; and if the gentleman will then look down to the bottom of the page, he will find all the payments which the Commissioners claim to have made to the creditors. The words used by the Commissioners are: "That the above mentioned disbursements, made during the year 1802, and amounting to $9,372,752 28, together with the above mentioned balance of 2,313,846 9 guilders sterling, which remained unexpended on the first day of January, 1802, have been applied as follows: that is to say—" After which words follow the particular items which he had enumerated when he was first up, and which constituted the applications of the money to the debt, together with the estimated remittances to Holland, and when deducted from the aggregate of disbursements from the Treasury, as he had already mentioned, left the balance of $114,839 44 for which no account has been rendered.

It may perhaps, said Mr. G. be pretended hereafter, that something has been paid to foreign officers, and on account of the registered debt; but, he hoped the gentleman from Maryland was now satisfied that nothing of that kind appeared in the present report. Indeed, said Mr. G., if these Treasury disbursements at the top of page six of the report, are to be considered as charges of the actual payment of those various sums to the creditors, he should then be compelled to make a much more formidable charge against the Commissioners, because it would be more certain and direct. The charge would then be, that the Commissioners had charged the public with $65,620 94, on account of payments to the domestic creditors, beyond the sums which were due to them, or ever actually paid, and that this sum was retained by the Commissioners by rendering a false account. To convince gentlemen, said Mr. G., that I was perfectly correct in this statement, I referred them to the Treasury report of last year, for the particular sums which were due to the domestic creditors in the year 1802. They were as follows:

For reimbursement and interest on the six per cent. and deferred stock	$3,350,362 01
For interest on the three per cent. stock	572,391 15
For interest on all other descriptions of domestic debt	828,350 50
Amount due in 1802	$4,751,103 66

The sums received by the Commissioners for account of this domestic debt, in 1802, as appears by the present report, were:

H. OF R.

Sinking Fund.

MARCH, 1803.

For account of interest and reimbursement of domestic debt	-	$4,654,699 61
For account of interest on domestic loans	-	162,025 00
Amount received by the Commissioners in 1802	-	$4,816,724 61

And if this amount is compared with the amount due, it will be found that the Commissioners have received from the Treasury, as has already been observed, $66,620 94 more than was due or could be paid to the creditors. But, said Mr. G., although I can see no necessity for the advance of so large a sum beyond what was due, yet as I presume that it is necessary to keep in advance a certain sum to the loan officers, beyond that which is payable—for the purpose of preventing any possible disappointment in the regular quarterly payments to the creditors—I shall make no further objection to this advance, so long as the Commissioners do not actually charge to the public more than is actually due to the creditors. And as this sum is to be considered as an advance from the Treasury, and not a charge of the Commissioners, I omitted to notice it when I was first up.

It had been said in reply to my remarks on the impropriety of rendering an account on estimate, that the Commissioners could do no more than estimate the remittances to Holland until they received the account of the bankers at Amsterdam. But, said Mr. G., the slightest attention will convince gentlemen that the remittances to Holland have nothing to do with the accounts of the bankers. The Commissioners undertake only to state what remittances they have purchased and paid for in this country, before the first day of January, 1803; and it was surely in their power to state the precise sum purchased and paid for; and the objection is, that, instead of doing this, they had only sent in an estimate which, for aught he knew, might be half a million wide of the truth.

Mr. RANDOLPH explained, and said, that it could not be supposed that at the time the report was made, the Commissioners had received returns from all the agents employed in purchasing remittances. He knew it had nothing to do with bankers in Holland.

Mr. GRISWOLD said that the explanation did not in the least mend the report; for that the Commissioners had declared in their report, that these remittances were exclusive of moneys in the hands of agents, and of course contained only those purchases of remittances, of which the Commissioners had received regular accounts; and the objection, as had been before explained, was not only that they had not stated precisely the amount of remittances, but they had not stated the moneys remaining in the hands of agents.

One gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) has mentioned the sale of the bank shares, and expressed his approbation of that extraordinary measure. That transaction had nothing to do, said Mr. G., with the resolution under consideration. He hoped, however, as the subject had been mentioned as late as it was, that it would be brought under discussion. He should, however, content himself with saying, that, from a careful examination of the law of 1796, and the circumstances of the sale, he was persuaded that the sale was unauthorized by law, and that this large amount of property was sacrificed by a sale much below its value, and that he differed altogether from the gentleman from Maryland in respect to the necessity and the prudence of the measure.

Mr. G. said that he would conclude the remarks which he had to submit upon the resolution, as no opposition had been made to it, by saying that although he did not charge the Commissioners with any absolute misapplication of the public money, yet he knew that in the management of ten millions, favorites might easily be accommodated with the use of large sums, and those who controlled this enormous sum might in a variety of ways avail themselves of its use, without leaving much room for detection, even after a detailed account had been rendered.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on agreeing to the resolutions of Mr. GRISWOLD, and unanimously carried in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the Committee of Ways and Means have leave to sit during the sitting of the House, and that Mr. DICKSON be appointed of the said Committee, in the room of Mr. HOLLAND, who has obtained leave of absence for the remainder of the session.

And then the House adjourned until six o'clock, post meridian.

SIX O'CLOCK, P. M.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning the salt springs on the waters of the Wabash river," with sundry amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to make Beaufort, the City of Washington, and Passamaquoddy, ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of Saint Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario; and the appointment of a Surveyor at Nanjemoy;" with sundry amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen; and for other purposes,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the salt springs on the waters of the Wabash river." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to make Beaufort, the City of Washington, and Passamaquoddy, ports of entry and delivery; to make Easton, Nanjemoy, and Tiverton, ports of delivery; to change the name of the district of Nanjemoy to that of Saint Mary's; to authorize the establishment of a new collection district on Lake Ontario, and the appointment of a Surveyor at Nanjemoy." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the act to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act entitled an act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen.

Mr. DAWSON observed that one of the amendments proposed by the Senate, allowed General Lafayette 11,500 acres of land, instead of 15,000, which was the quantity an officer of his rank was entitled to.

The amendment was referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. SOUTHARD, GODDARD, and DAWSON.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial system of the United States;'" Whereupon,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said amendment be postponed until to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That Mr. NICHOLSON and Mr. RANDOLPH be appointed a committee, to go to the Senate, and, at the bar thereof, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

Ordered, That the committee do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment.

Mr. HELMS, from the committee to whom was this day committed the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds, received in actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war," made a report; which was ordered to lie on the table.

JUDGE PICKERING.

On motion of Mr. NICHOLSON the House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the select committee, on the Message of the President of the United States, with the accompanying documents, relative to the official conduct of John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the district of New Hampshire.

The report of the committee recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of the district of New Hampshire, be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. HUGER objected to acting in this case at so late a period of the session.

Mr. GODDARD moved the rising of the Committee, in order to postpone the resolution to the next session.

Messrs. MITCHILL, DANA, and MOTT, supported; and Messrs. NICHOLSON, BACON, HASTINGS, ELMER, RANDOLPH, and EUSTIS, opposed the motion. Motion lost—yeas 9, nays 43.

The Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the resolution.

The House immediately took up the report, and concurred with the Committee in the above resolution—yeas 45, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—John Archer, John Bacon, Theodorus Bailey, Walter Bowie, Robert Brown, William Butler, Samuel J. Cabell, Thomas Claiborne, Matthew Clay, John Clopton, John Condit, Thomas T. Davis, William Dickson, Peter Early, Lucas Elmendorf, Ebenezzer Elmer, William Eustis, Edwin Gray, John A. Hanna, Seth Hastings, Daniel Heister, Joseph Heister, William Helms, William Hoge, David Holmes, Michael Leib, David Meriwether, Samuel L. Mitchell, James Mott, Anthony New, Thomas Newton, jr., Joseph H. Nicholson, John Randolph, jr., John Smilie, John Smith, of New York, Samuel Smith, Henry Southard, Richard Stanford, Joseph Stanton, John Stewart, Philip R. Thompson, Abram Trigg, John Trigg, Joseph B. Varnum, and Thomas Wynns.

NAYS—John Campbell, Samuel W. Dana, John Davenport, Calvin Goddard, Samuel Hunt, John Cotton Smith, Samuel Tenney, and Peleg Wadsworth.

THURSDAY, March 3.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee to whom were yesterday referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force an act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act in addition to an act regulating the grants of land appropriated for military services, and for the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, and for other purposes,'" reported to the House their agreement to the same.

The House then proceeded to consider the said amendments of the Senate, at the Clerk's table: Whereupon, the question being taken that the House do concur with the committee in their agreement to the same, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was yesterday referred the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to make provision for persons that have been disabled by known wounds, received in the actual service of the United States, during the Revolutionary War." which lay on the table: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said amendment.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act regulating the grants of land, and providing for the disposal of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States, and for erecting certain arsenals;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported to the House, without amendment.

The said bill was then read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled an act to amend the Judicial system of the United States:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

Ordered, That the Committee of the whole House to whom were recommitted, on the twenty-fourth of January last, the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to carry into effect several resolutions of Congress, for erecting monuments to the memories of the Generals Wooster, Harkeimer, Davidson, and Scriven," and sundry amendments to the said bill, reported by a select committee, be discharged therefrom; and that the farther consideration of the said bill and amendments be postponed until the first Monday in November next.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee who were instructed by a resolution of this House, of the twenty-eighth of January last, "to digest some plan by which it can be ascertained what quantity of surveyed or patented land belonging to the officers and soldiers of Virginia, on State and Continental Establishments, was ceded to the Cherokee Indians, by the Treaty of Holstein, of the second of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one," made a farther report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill further to alter and discontinue certain post roads, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported farther progress therein.

On the question that the Committee of the whole House have leave to sit again on the said bill, it passed in the negative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the amendment proposed by this House, on the twentieth of January last, to the second amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three," and do insist on their second amendment: they desire a conference with this House, on the subject-matter of the said amendment, to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to reconsider their amendment to their second amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand eight hundred and three:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede from said amendment to the amendment.

Mr. NICHOLSON, from the committee appointed on the second instant, reported,

That, in obedience to the order of the House, the committee had been to the Senate, and, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, had impeached John Pickering, Judge of the District Court, of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors; and had acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles against him, and make good the same.

And further, That the committee had demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to lay before this House, early in the next session of Congress, a digest of the laws to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, with such alterations as may be deemed necessary thereto; and a digest of the laws for recording and registering of ships and vessels of the United States, with such amendments thereto, as he may deem useful and proper.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized to employ an additional clerk in his office, until the first day of the next session of Congress, at the same rate of compensation allowed to engrossing clerks, and to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to lay before this House, early in the next session of Congress, a view of the light money payable by vessels of the United States, entering the different ports of the nations entering their own ports.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter to him from the Comptroller of the Treasury, and sundry statements, marked A, B, C, and D, prepared in obedience to the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," passed the second day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be authorized to pay to the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Doorkeeper and Assistant Doorkeeper, two hundred dollars each, in addition to their present allowance; and, also, fifty dollars to Alexander Claxton, out of the contingent fund of the House.

* A message from the Senate communicated to the House certain proceedings of the Senate, relative to the impeachment of John Pickering, Judge of the District Court for the district of New Hampshire.

The said proceedings of the Senate were read, and are as follows:

"IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

"March 3, 1803.

"Whereas the House of Representatives have this day, by two of their members, Mr. NICHOLSON, and Mr. RANDOLPH, at the bar of the Senate, impeached John Pickering, Judge of the District Court for the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and have acquitted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same: and have likewise demanded that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate notify the House of Representatives of this resolution.

"Attest: SAM. A. OTIS, Secretary."

Ordered That the said proceedings of the Senate do lie on the table.

Resolved, That Mr. SAMUEL SMITH and Mr. JOHN COTTON SMITH be appointed a committee, on the part of this House, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

Mr. S. SMITH, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress, reported that the committee had performed that service; and that the President signified to them he had no farther communication to make during the present session.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized and directed to pay out of the moneys appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of the House, to the principal and engrossing clerks in the office of the Clerk of the House, respectively, two hundred dollars each, for their extra services during the present session.

SALE OF BANK STOCK.

Mr. BAYARD.—I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a resolution which I propose to submit to the House, the object of which is to institute an inquiry relative to the sale made by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund of the bank stock which belonged to the United States. I regret exceedingly that it has not been in my power to bring forward this measure at an earlier period of the session, but the want of documents which it was necessary to procure at a distance has rendered the delay unavoidable. The pressure of business for some days past has allowed no interval in which the motion could be made, and the election only has been left to me to seize this late moment, or wholly abandon the object.

Before I lay the resolution on the table, I feel it incumbent upon me to explain the ground upon which I introduce it, being sensible that after it is once laid upon the table, the practice under a late rule of the House which prohibits debate upon the question of taking up business, would preclude any exposition of the principles or facts upon which the resolution is predicated.

This experience I derive from the conduct of the House upon the resolution I offered relative to the indemnification of our merchants, on the ground of the French spoliations, for which the claim of satisfaction upon the French Government had been renounced by our late treaty with that Power. The resolution I repeatedly endeavored to call up, and, without being suffered to enter into a discussion of the subject, was uniformly put down by a silent vote.

The resolution which I now propose to offer would be equally unattended with information as effect, without a development of the grounds, which, according to the view I have taken of the subject, ought to recommend it to the adoption of the House.

From a full consideration of the law under which we are informed the sale of the bank stock was made, I am persuaded the Commissioners had not an authority to make the sale; and I am also convinced, from documents I possess, that, admitting a power existed to sell the stock, the measure was inexpedient, and the bargain much worse for the interests of the United States than could have been obtained, and in fact was offered, at the time.

Having this impression with regard to the business, I consider it as the duty of this House to make it an object of inquiry, and I feel it but as a small objection that the inquiry cannot be completed during the session.

The first point to which I shall beg the attention of the House is the authority under which the stock was sold.

I do not mean to deny that a power once existed to sell the whole stock which belonged to the United States, but I think it will not be difficult to show that that power expired when the circumstances ceased to exist which had given birth to it.

It is material to the just understanding of the subject to refer directly to the loans made by the Bank of the United States to the Government, and from which was derived the balance due to the bank, and for the payment of which balance a power was delegated to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, by the act of Congress of the 31st May, 1796, to sell the bank stock. There was then due to the bank on account of the subscription loan - - - - - $1,400,000

Of this debt of $5,700,000, $4,400,000 fell due in the year 1796, including in the last mentioned sum $500,000, which the Secretary of the Treasury reported would be necessary to raise by loan on the 1st January, 1795.

The act of 1796 extending its provisions to the instalments of foreign debt which fell due in the year 1796, it is necessary to include in the statement an instalment of the foreign debt which fell due in that year, amounting to the sum of

$963,641

Aggregate due to the bank in the same year - - - - -

4,400,000

5,363,641

This was the debt accruing, and composed in the manner stated, for which provision was designed to be made by the act of 1796. It had not been supposed till the beginning of 1796 that the wants or interest of the bank would require an early payment of the debt due to them from the United States. But in the commencement of that year an intimation was given to the Government that the affairs of the bank rendered it expedient that provision should be made for the discharge of the debt due to them. On the 16th of March, the Committee of Ways and Means were directed by the House of Representatives to ascertain from the President and Directors of the bank whether the loans to the United States could not be continued to more remote periods.

The committee having conferred with the President and Directors, afterwards received the following answer, which I find among the printed reports of the year upon the table, and which I shall beg leave to read:

“The Committee of Ways and Means have, pursuant to the order of the House of the 16th ult., made the inquiry therein directed, and have received from the President and Directors of the bank the answer and information herewith submitted:

“The committee appointed to confer with the Committee of Ways and Means on the subject of continuing to a more remote period the loans made to the United States having reported, the board took into consideration the most essential points that had relation to the present subject, viz: the great increase in the price of all alienable property, which requires a corresponding addition of circulating medium to represent it; the necessity of placing this institution in a more respectable situation in point of available funds, which will enable it to promote more generally the interest of commerce and manufactures, and afford the means of facilitating the financial operations of the Government by temporary loans, whenever the fiscal administration may require such a resource, as well as the more immediate advantage of the stockholders and customers of the bank, as both intimately connected with the active employment of a larger specie capital; whereupon,

“Resolved, That the United States be requested to extinguish the loans that are already due to the bank, as well as to make provision for those which may become payable in the course of the present year.”

This requisition upon the part of the bank left no alternative to the Government but to make immediate provision to comply with their engagements.

The resources of the Treasury were not then as ample as a flourishing and increased commerce has since rendered them. It had moreover been drained by numerous miscellaneous claims which arose out of the war, and which had remained unsatisfied under the former Confederation, by the Indian war, by the Western insurrection, and by an expensive treaty with Algiers. In the actual state of things, the Government had no means to raise the money required, and preserve the faith of the United States, but by making a loan or disposing of the property which belonged to them. Under the pressure of this necessity the act of May, 1796, was passed. The power of the Commissioners to sell the bank stock is derived from this act, and the true question upon the point we are considering is, whether the authority delegated was simple, absolute, and permanent, or occasional and dependent upon circumstances. This question is to be determined by the design intended to be accomplished by the Legislature who passed the law. In my opinion, the intention of the Legislature is veiled in obscurity. It never was the design of Congress to make the bank stock a principal and direct fund for the payment of the debts stated, but only an auxiliary and contingent resource upon failure of the ordinary funds to satisfy the engagements of the Government. It is my wish to avoid unnecessary detail, but the subject is of that nature as to require a minute examination. The House will suffer me to bring to their view such parts of the act of 1796 as most materially concern the question which we are considering. The first section of the act empowers the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to borrow on the credit of the United States a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, to be applied to the payment of the principal of any part of the debt of the United States then due or to become due in the course of that year to the Bank of the United States, to the bank of New York, or for any instalment of foreign debt; and certificates for six per cent. stock irredeemable till 1819 were to be issued for any sums borrowed. The third section of the act provided that it should be deemed a good execution of the power to borrow, for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to cause to be constituted certificates of stock of the description before mentioned, and to cause the same to be sold in the United States or elsewhere, provided that not more than one moiety of the stock should be sold under par. We then find a clause in the following words from which the Commissioners infer their power to sell the bank stock:

MARCH, 1803.

H. OF R.

"And it shall be lawful for the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, if they shall find the same to be most advantageous, to sell such and so many of the shares of the stock of the Bank of the United States belonging to the United States as they may think proper; and that they apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of the said debts, instead of selling certificates of stock in the manner prescribed in this act."

The act of Congress provided three ways of raising the money required:

1st. By an ordinary loan; 2d, by the sale of six per cent. stock below par; 3d, by the sale of the bank stock.

The money at that time was not to be borrowed. The bank had been the common lender, but it was the bank which was now to be paid. The Commissioners then had recourse to the constitution of six per cent. stock, and sent for experiment $80,000 to New York to be sold. The stock was sold, but at a discount of twenty per cent. The loss was too enormous to suffer this course to be further pursued. The only fund which remained, and to which the Commissioners were driven by necessity, was the bank stock. They accordingly sold 2,780 shares, which produced the sum of $1,384,260, which was applied pursuant to the directions of the act of Congress.

My design in distinguishing the several loans which formed the aggregate of the debt intended to be provided for by the act of 1796, was in order to refer those disposed to make the inquiry to the direct and special provision of a fund in each law authorizing a loan, eventually to answer the debt to be contracted. This fund was the surplus of duties on imports and tonnage. The surplus of the ordinary revenue was made by law the immediate, and, in itself, was the natural fund to meet the debts in question. While such surplus existed, it was clearly not the intention of the act of 1796 to suffer six per cent. stock to be constituted and sold under par, or to allow any of the active and productive funds of the United States to be disposed of. The power to sell the six per cents and the bank stock, was evidently predicated upon the failure of the original funds provided, in consequence of the ordinary revenue being absorbed by prior encumbrances.

Can any gentleman affirm that it was the intention of the law to suffer six per cents to be sold under par, or the bank stock to be aliened, when there was idle money lying in the Treasury, wanted for no exigency, and bound by no appropriation? Now, sir, what are the circumstances under which the stock has been sold? It appears from the Message of the President, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that there was a surplus of money, beyond expenditures, in the Treasury, during the last year, of $4,500,000. At the commencement of the last year, the debt due to the bank was $2,740,000. It does not appear that the bank had even requested the payment of this balance. But if it was the interest of the Government to discharge it, why was it not paid out of the inactive, unproductive money in the Treasury, without destroying a fruitful and profitable fund? I affirm that it was not simply an abuse, but an assumption of power to sell the bank stock, while there was an unappropriated surplus in the Treasury more than competent to answer the purposes for which the stock was sold. It cannot be doubted that if such a surplus had existed at the date of the act of 1796, that the power to sell the stock created by that law would not have been delegated. The creation of the power was a measure of necessity, and its existence depended upon the continuance of the same necessity. The bank stock was not a direct and immediate fund; it was simply auxiliary, and therefore contingent. The laws under which the debts were contracted, and the funds provided for their payment, considered collectively, plainly speak this language to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, "in the event that the surplus of ordinary revenue does not enable you to pay the instalment of foreign debt, and the debts due to the bank, you shall have power to sell the bank stock." A power depending on a certain event has no existence without the occurrence of the event. In the present instance the event did not exist which was the ground of the power given to the Commissioners, and their act therefore in the sale of the stock was not warranted by law. To discharge the debt due to the bank was the ostensible motive, but not the real object, to the sale of the stock. After a sum equal to the amount of the proceeds of the sale of the stock was applied to the payment of the debt due to the bank, there still remained due to them the sum of $1,452,400. And although the United States had an unproductive capital in their Treasury of $4,500,000, and the balance due to the bank was bearing interest, yet the money was suffered to lie useless in the Treasury, though capable of extinguishing an increasing debt.

The true object in selling the stock was to facilitate the remittance to Holland of an instalment of Dutch debt. I shall not, however, trouble the House with any remarks upon this Treasury operation, because it can be of no importance to inquire into the true pretence of selling the stock, for in fact there was no power existing to make the sale. But it is connected with the subject to remark that this supposed power had been dormant for six years. During this long period the bank had not required, nor the Commissioners considered themselves either bound or at liberty to execute it. The law was designed for an occasional emergency. It gave an authority to sell the whole stock, or such part of it, as the demands on the Government at that time required. The Commissioners sold a part, and as much as was necessary to accomplish the design of the law. This was a complete execution of the authority, and the act since that time has been considered to be functus officio. Upon this point I shall request the liberty of making but one further observation.

The sale was permitted to be made only in case the Commissioners found it most advantageous to the United States. Now, sir, can it be said that it was most advantageous to the United States, or advantageous to them in any degree, to sell stock producing a profit of eight per cent. on the nominal capital, in order to pay a debt which might have been discharged by money in the Treasury, not wanted, and which produced no profit at all? In every view in which the subject presents itself to my mind, I consider myself warranted in saying that the act of the Commissioners in selling the bank stock was unauthorized by any law.

I shall now, Mr. Speaker, proceed to the consideration of the terms upon which the sale was made, and I have the means of showing that those terms were not as advantageous to the United States as it was the duty and in the power of the Government to obtain. I confess, sir, that this point in a great degree depends upon matters of fact, with respect to which gentlemen will form their opinions according to the information which they possess or may receive from the floor. We have taken pains to be accurately informed as to the facts which I shall undertake to state, and I am happy in being sensible that if I have been wrongly informed, the public, who are quite capable of discovering my errors, cannot be imposed upon. Upon this head there are two questions:

1st. Whether the stock was sold for the best price the market afforded?

2d. If not, whether the loss was compensated by any advantage which the Government derived from undertakings upon the part of the purchaser?

I am furnished with a price-current, which I believe to be accurate, of the bank stock at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and London, about the time when the sale was made by the Commissioners.

The House will permit me to state the prices.

Boston, 1802: July 12, United States bank stock, 150; dividend off.

New York, 1802: April 14, and 21, and May 1—150. May 22—149; May 25—150. June 8—150; June 18—153½; June 19—154. July 9—151; July 16—151.

Philadelphia, 1802: July 1—151; July 3—150; July 7—151; July 10—151½; July 15—153½; July 21—154; July 23, 24, 26, 27—153½.

London, 1802: February 9—153½; April 7—155½; April 27—158, advice received 4th of June. June 10—155. July 4—151.

These prices were taken from actual sales. I shall assume the value of the stock at 150, though the average of the prices stated would warrant a higher rate.

The sale made by the Commissioners was in June, 1802, and the payments were to be made at the following periods in Amsterdam:

January 1, 1803—605,000 guilders; February 1, 1803—685,000 guilders; March 1, 1803—425,000 guilders; June 1, 1803—1,425,487 16½ guilders.

In consequence of this arrangement, the purchaser received two dividends upon the bank stock before any payment was made on his part, which of course composes a part of the profit of his bargain.

The shares sold, 2,220, at 150, were worth	$1,332,000
The two dividends, at $32 upon a share, amounted to	75,480

The value, therefore, the United States parted with was	1,407,480
The sale was in fact made at 145, and yielded only	1,287,600

The United States plainly, therefore, lost

119,880

When recurrence is had to the times of payment allowed to the purchaser, he may fairly be considered as deriving the benefit of two dividends and a half upon the stock instead of two, as the payments are protracted by successive instalments, and the last instalment exceeding 1,460,000 guilders, not payable till June, 1803. But on an estimate undeniable, and as low as any gentleman can contend for, the United States incur a certain loss of $119,880.

We are now to inquire what benefit afforded by the contract will compensate this loss.

It is stated by the Commissioners that Mr. Baring, the purchaser, in consideration of the sale of the stock at 45 per cent. advance, undertook to pay in Amsterdam 3,140,487,16½ guilders, at the rate of 41 cents the guilder. The result of this engagement, on the part of Mr. Baring, depends upon the course of exchange at the time between the United States and Amsterdam, or between the United States and London, and London and Amsterdam.

The Commissioners state the rate of exchange between this country and Holland at 41 cents the guilder, and the exchange between England and Holland to have been ten guilders, eight stivers per pound sterling, which is 12 stivers below par. This information they say was collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, in an excursion to Philadelphia and New York. I do not know that the information is incorrect, but it is not complete. It does not state the exchange between the United States and London, according to communications which I have received, and in which I confide; the following were the rates of exchange:

MARCH, 1803.

Sale of Bank Stock.

H. OF R.

Course of exchange in New York and Philadelphia on London: March, 1802, 96 to 97; April, 98; May, 99; June and July, from par to two per cent. advance.

In Boston and Salem, on London: June 10, 1802, 98 per cent.

In London upon Amsterdam: April 30, 1802, 10 guilders and 16 stivers per pound sterling; May, 10 guilders and 15 stivers per pound sterling; June 11, 10 guilders and 17 stivers per pound sterling; June 25, 10 guilders and 18 stivers per pound sterling; July 9, 10 guilders and 17 stivers per pound sterling; July 20, 10 guilders and 17½ stivers per pound sterling.

It will be recollected that 11 guilders to the pound sterling is the par of exchange.

Now, sir, if the statements which I have made be correct as to the course of exchange, the Commissioners, so far from having gained anything for the United States by the purchase of bills on Holland at 41 cents the guilder, have added to our loss, and to the profit of the purchaser of the stock.

In March, April, and May, bills on London might have been bought under par; during and subsequent to the same period, bills in London on Amsterdam might have been purchased also under par. The Government, therefore, might have remitted the instalment of the Dutch debt to Amsterdam, by the way of London, have allowed a commission of one per cent. for the operation, and yet made the remittance at par, and probably below it. This certainly was practicable, when during the period referred to the average of exchange between the United States and London was two per cent. below par, and the exchange between London and Amsterdam more than a half per cent. below par. Let me now ask what have the Commissioners saved by their contract to compensate the sacrifice of twenty dollars upon each of the 2,220 shares of stock which they sold?

They have sold our stock considerably below the market price, and have taken bills on Holland in order to indemnify the United States, at a rate nearly two and a half per cent. above par, when the remittance might have been made at par. And it will be remembered at the same time that a fund producing eight per cent. to the United States was sacrificed to make this remittance when there was a dead, unproductive capital in the Treasury, which might have been more beneficially employed to accomplish the same purpose.

Will gentlemen say that this strange transaction ought not to be investigated, and the motives and design of it understood? It is undeniable that a sacrifice was made of twenty dollars on each share, amounting upon the whole sale to $44,000. That two dividends were also sacrificed, amounting to $75,450, and making an aggregate loss to the United States of $119,880. And the compensation for this loss is an agreement to remit $1,287,600 to Amsterdam for a premium of two and a half per cent., amounting to the sum of $32,190. when even this premium might have been saved by due attention and proper management.

This premium paid for the remittance ought to be added to the loss of the United States in the transaction, and will increase it to the sum of $152,070. The excuse for this sacrifice is a speculative suggestion of the Commissioners, that if the Government had come into the market in order to purchase bills to the amount of the instalment to be paid in Holland, their demand must have raised the price of bills greatly above par.

But, sir, why was not the experiment made, and made at that period of the year when bills were low, and extended to the different commercial towns of the United States? By the report of the Commissioners, it would seem that applications were made only to the Bank of the United States, and to the Manhattan Bank. A contract of this description was not properly the business of any bank, and, therefore, it could not be expected that any bank would enter into the contract without a certain prospect of extraordinary profit. The Bank of the United States would have nothing to do with the business, and the Manhattan Bank offered to make the remittance at 43 cents the guilder. This offer I will show presently was more advantageous to the Government than the one accepted. But, sir, what I consider a just ground of complaint against the conduct of the Commissioners, is, that more industry was not employed to purchase bills with the idle money in the Treasury, in our different trading towns. Considering the large remittances annually made to England, the demand of the Government could not have materially affected the market if a competition had been excited. But it would seem as if a veil of secrecy had been thrown over the transaction, and I believe I am warranted in saying that scarcely a merchant in the United States was informed of the treaty with Mr. Baring until it was completed.

I shall claim the attention of the House but a few moments longer, and it is in order to show that the terms offered by the Manhattan Bank were more beneficial than those acceded to by the Government. A very short statement demonstrates the position. The profit allowed to Mr. Baring was twenty dollars on each bank share, and two dividends, amounting to the sum of $119,880 dollars. In consideration of this allowance, Mr. Baring undertook to pay in Amsterdam $1,287,600, at 41 cents the guilder. The Manhattan Bank, without any other profit, offered to pay the same sum in Amsterdam at 43 cents the guilder. The difference is two cents the guilder, which is less than five per cent. But calculating the difference at five per cent. it amounts only to the sum of $64,380. The profit allowed to Mr. Baring was $119,380. As the Manhattan Bank offered to take the contract at $64,380, their terms were of consequence $55,500 lower than those accepted. Why, sir, was this sum of money thrown away? The solidity of the bank, or their competency to perform the operation, was not doubted, and yet the Government have preferred to give $55,500 more than the bank demanded to an individual to undertake to make the remittance.

I shall trouble the House no longer; it is extremely possible that I have been wrongly informed as to material facts upon which my calculations are built, or my view of the subject may be fallacious. I will not, therefore, rashly condemn the conduct of the Commissioners. But, sir, strongly impressed as I am that the conduct of the Commissioners was not only unauthorized by law, but inexpedient and extremely imprudent, I have considered it as my duty to submit to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That inquiry ought to be made relative to the authority of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to make sale of the shares of the stock of the Bank of the United States, belonging to the United States; and also as to the expediency of the said sale, and the profit or loss resulting therefrom to the United States.

Mr. RANDOLPH expressed his surprise that such a motion should be made at such a time. The sale of the bank shares owned by the United States had, for many months previous to the meeting of Congress, been the theme of much public as well as private discussion; and now, sir, as if it were an event of yesterday, on the very last day of their political existence, a resolution was offered demanding an inquiry into the legality and expediency of the measure; and, that nothing might be wanting to complete the singularity of the business, this motion is brought forward by a gentleman who quotes the law under which the transaction took place, and who confesses himself satisfied as to the most material point of the proposed inquiry—the legality of the sale. [Mr. BAYARD said he had not confessed that the law authorized the sale.] Mr. R. continued. The gentleman will very soon perceive that his expressions have not been changed nor his meaning misunderstood. He did not, indeed, in so many words, affirm the sale to have been authorized by law, since his object was to prove its illegality; but he declared (he will recollect it, for the words were taken down) that the Commissioners would have been authorized to sell those shares in a case of extreme necessity. [Mr. BAYARD bowed, in assent.] And what is this, said Mr. R., but to acknowledge that a discretionary power on the subject was vested by law in the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund? Who were to judge of the necessity of which the gentleman speaks but the Commissioners? And what necessity would give them the power, if not transferred to them by law? Could the necessity create a law? And are the Commissioners to do any act not authorized by law, under the plea of a necessity of which they are to judge? Certainly not. The gentleman, therefore, by conceding that this sale would have been legal in a case of necessity, has abandoned altogether the question of its legality—the main branch of his inquiry. Mr. R. said that the interruption of the mover of the resolution had compelled him to anticipate some of the observations which he had to offer.

It is not a little curious that the gentleman, in imitation of his friend from Connecticut, should preface his motion by a long speech, tending to criminate the conduct into which he wished to inquire, because, as he had stated, he could not be permitted by the rules of the House to make any observations on his motion, if it had been submitted in the first instance, until the House should have agreed to take it into consideration. How the question of order was affected by this ingenious device, Mr. R. said, he would leave the House to determine. He had called neither of the gentlemen to order, because he was aware of the imputation which might be thrown out, (he would not say that the opportunity for making it had been courted) that the House shrunk from investigation.

Mr. R. said that the objection to the sale of the bank shares divided itself into two questions—the legality and the expediency of the measure. By the act of the 31st May, 1796, which had been quoted, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were empowered to borrow a sum, not exceeding five millions of dollars, to be applied to the discharge of the debt due to the several banks before or during the year 1796. It moreover declared that it should be a good execution of the power to borrow, either to create a six per cent. stock, irredeemable until the close of the year 1819, or to sell the bank shares—the property of the United States; provided that not more than one-half of the stock to be created should be sold below par—a provision which barely secured something more than 50 per cent. for the stock, since, by selling a certain amount at par, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund might dispose of an equal amount to the same purchaser at 99 per cent. below it. The stock created by virtue of this law, and known in all our financial statements by the name of the 1796 six per cent. stock, (because issued in that year,) was accordingly sold to the bank itself, (the creditor,) at a loss of 20 per cent.; the United States, in fact, renewing their obligation to the bank, with that additional encumbrance. Unwilling, however, to persist in so ruinous a measure, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund issued only eighty thousand dollars of that stock, and resorted to the other alternative, the bank shares, 2,780 of which they sold to meet the more pressing demands of the banks, leaving still undischarged a considerable debt to them. Mr. R. said that the act in question contained no limitation clause as to the time of its duration, and that it had never been repealed. It was likewise worthy of remark, that it was entirely silent as to the necessity, of which so much had been said. The meaning of the law, like that of all others, must therefore be inferred from its own provisions, and not from the impressions of individual members who were present on its passage. Under these circumstances, the law must remain in full force until carried into complete execution. Its only limitations were the amount which the Commissioners were authorized to raise, and the objects to which the money, thus raised, was to be applied. It was not alleged that the proceeds of the last sale of bank stock did, together with the sale made in 1796, and the eighty thousand dollars six per cent. stock then created, exceed the sum which the Commissioners were authorized to raise by the act of the 31st of May, 1796. In fact they fell far short of it; and as to the object to which they had been applied, let gentlemen consult the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which was laid before the House early in the session. Mr. R. then read an extract from that report:

MARCH, 1803.

Sale of Bank Stock.

H. OF R.

"Of the 5,000 shares of stock of the Bank of the United States, 2,780 had been sold in 1796, by virtue of the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States, and for the purpose of discharging a part of the debt due to the bank.' The remaining 2,220 shares were now, under the same authority, sold at 45 per cent. advance. The $1,287,600 which they produced, were, in conformity with the provisions of that act, applied towards discharging an equal amount of that part of the debt due to the bank before or during the year 1796; and the purchaser of the stock sold, at the same time, to the Treasury, an equal amount in bills on Holland."

The sum to which they were limited, by the law in question, not having been exceeded, and the money having been applied to the very purpose specified in the act, what doubt could exist of the legality of the transaction? And if any doubt did exist, the law being designated by the Commissioners themselves, under which they had acted, were not the House competent to decide whether the construction given to it was or was not correct? It was no matter of fact, which a select committee alone could investigate, but the true intent and meaning of a short act of Congress which was to be determined. It is conceded that, in a case of extreme necessity, the sale would have been authorized by law, because the first sale was made under those circumstances. At that time, we are told, the Treasury was empty, our credit 20 per cent. below par, and the bank urgent and clamorous for a debt which we had no other means to pay. But now, so far from being pressing for their money, the bank would be glad to let it remain in our hands: our credit was high, and the Treasury overflowing. Mr. R. thanked the gentleman for the high encomium which he had passed upon the present order of men and things, and for the picture which he had drawn of our prosperity, when contrasted with our necessitous condition in 1796. This eulogium was perhaps undesigned, but it was not therefore the less valuable or sincere. To have legalized this procedure of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and to have obtained the support of the gentleman from Delaware, it was only necessary to have begged the Exchequer, and to have impaired the public credit. Then, indeed, we should have found favor in his sight, and the sale of the stock, at whatever loss, would have been altogether legal and expedient. But to have millions in the Treasury is what the gentleman cannot brook, and to sell 2,220 bank shares for (within less than an hundred thousand dollars) as much as was obtained for 2,780 in 1796, is the offence which has excited his animadversion. And if the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were to purchase the 1796 six per cents, the Administration might be reproached with having raised the credit of that stock to 100 cents in the dollar which had been issued at 80.

In respect to the expediency of the measure, Mr. R. said that this must be decided, not by the mere price at which the stock was sold, but by both the contracts with Mr. Baring, taken together; and if (which he believed to be the case) as much was gained on the contract for bills as was lost on the sale of the stock, (supposing a loss to have been sustained,) the sale could not be condemned on the ground of expediency. The House would recollect that a gentleman from Maryland, of undoubted commercial information, had, on a late occasion, informed them that, but for this negotiation, the merchants would have been able to dictate to the Treasury their own terms of exchange. Would the House put such information as this, and the extensive and accurate knowledge which the official character of the Secretary of the Treasury enabled him to obtain, in competition with the anonymous allegations which had been produced, coming perhaps from mere stockjobbers? For the gentleman from Delaware did not inform the House of the quarter from whence his information was derived. Mr. R. said that his habits did not lead him to an accurate and detailed knowledge of the course of exchange between the United States and Europe, and the different States of Europe with each other; but he believed it would be difficult to establish the fact that the exchange had been in our favor with England, or generally in favor of London with Amsterdam. The Treasury had been accused of not taking a sufficiently extensive range, and purchasing bills in Salem and Boston, where the exchange was more favorable. He had it from the head of that department, in conversation with him, that an attempt to purchase a few hundred thousand guilders in Salem or Boston, (he did not recollect which,) gave an immediate spring to the price of exchange there; and, on inquiry, he found that remittance to the desired amount could not be obtained on better terms, in those towns, than in the other commercial cities of the United States.

It had been remarked that the dividends on the bank stock sold had been given in to the purchaser; but was not the money immediately paid in discharge of the bank debt? And, moreover, was not the stock retained until information should be received of the payment of the bills drawn on Holland?

Mr. R. observed that, in this transaction, the House would not consider the rate of exchange merely, (favorable as the contract was,) but the secure footing on which the business was placed. Heretofore we had had bills returned upon our hands, but, in this transaction, a valuable consideration was retained in our hands until we should be assured that they were paid.

Mr. R. concluded by congratulating the House on the variance between the charges brought against the present and the former Administration. Formerly, the ground of complaint was, that the public treasure was wasted, and debts to a large amount incurred. Now, the theme of animadversion is, that the Treasury is overflowing with money, and that these debts are paid. Under an unshaken conviction of the legality of the conduct of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and a firm persuasion that the sale was beneficial to the United States; persuaded, also, that this was neither the proper time nor manner for examining into the facts mentioned by the gentleman from Delaware, he should give his dissent to the resolution.

Mr. S. SMITH.—I will not regret that the gentleman from Delaware has thought proper to introduce his resolution by a lengthy speech at two o'clock of the day on which the present Congress ceases to exist; nor will I presume that the gentleman had any other object in view than that which a sense of duty compelled him to; nor do I mean to make this late period an objection to the discussing of the subject; for although unprepared by any previous notice of the gentleman's intention, I will take leave to notice some of his estimates and views.

The gentleman has taken two views of the subject; the one as to the legality of the late sale of the bank stock, the other as to its expediency. He acknowledges that, under the act of 1796, making provision for the payment of certain debts of the United States, two thousand seven hundred and eighty shares of bank stock had been sold during that year, and that such sale was legal; and yet, although the very same law still continues to exist, the gentleman insists that the late sale of two thousand two hundred and twenty shares, made by the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, was not legal. He has given reasons which, no doubt, operate on his mind in favor of that opinion; but he has given one reason which would have convinced me, if I had not been already satisfied, that the sale was legal; for he has said, that, had the necessity of the case demanded the sale, then the sale would have been legal. If, then, a necessity would have made the sale legal, I would ask the gentleman, who was to be the judge of such necessity? Was it that gentleman and his friends, or was it the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund? The gentleman will agree with me that the Commissioners alone could judge, could act; the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears by the documents, submitted to them a report, on the seventh day of June, 1802, and they resolved "that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to sell the shares of the stock of the Bank of the United States, belonging to the United States, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of the principal of the debt due by the United States to the Bank of the United States, before or during the year 1796."

Now, Mr. Speaker, had I doubted my own construction of the law, that doubt would have been removed when I see the decision on its legality given by the Secretary of State, and the Attorney General, the great law-officer of the Government; those gentlemen have given their opinions, not hastily as the gentleman from Delaware has done, but officially and after mature consideration. The gentleman apologizes for the first sale by saying that the Bank of the United States pressed for payment at a time that was very inconvenient for the United States to pay; and compelled the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1796, to sell at great disadvantage. He admits that, if the bank had, prior to the late sale, pressed for payment, and there had been no other money in the Treasury, that in such case the sale would not only have been legal but expedient. Could the gentleman have given a stronger reason in favor of the expediency and propriety of the late sale of the remaining bank stock than the conduct of the bank in 1796? Knowing, as the bank did, the wants of the United States at that period, payment was demanded, and so insisted upon, the gentleman tells us, that the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund were compelled to sell two thousand seven hundred and eighty shares of bank stock, at less than five hundred dollars each share, to comply, as the gentleman says, with the urgency of the moment. Now, sir, if there had been no other reason, the paying off the bank when convenient to ourselves would have been sufficient, thereby liberating ourselves from a debt to an institution that, judging from their former conduct, (as related by the gentleman,) we had reason to fear, might seize on some other moment of urgency and compel us to sacrifice the remaining stock to disadvantage. The Commissioners have, therefore, done well, sir; they have seized a favorable opportunity and have sold the two thousand two hundred and twenty shares of bank stock belonging to the United States at five hundred and eighty dollars each share; amounting nearly to the same sum as was obtained by a former board for two thousand seven hundred and eighty shares, and have paid therewith an equal amount of debt due the bank. But the gentleman says that the stock was worth six hundred dollars each share; and that, of course, twenty dollars each share less was received, than ought to have been obtained.

I will admit, sir, that bank stock was worth six hundred dollars each share, at the time of the late sale—nay, sir, I will do more—I will inform the gentleman that Mr. Baring, the very person who purchased the stock, did offer the Secretary six hundred dollars each share, payable in money, into the Treasury, or five hundred and eighty dollars, payable in Holland, at the rate of 41 cents the guilder. I think the Secretary was right in preferring the last terms. Indeed such was the opinion of many merchants at the time the sale was made. I will now endeavor to show that the sale was expedient, judicious, and advantageous. To do this, I really know no language stronger than that in the Secretary's report of the 7th of June last, to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, in which he says:

"That, from the great diminution of trade between this country and Holland, it is impracticable to obtain bills on Holland, to the amount necessary for the year 1803; that exchange was already forty-one cents the guilder, and that an attempt to purchase the large amount now wanted, say $2,347,000 would raise exchange; that exchange on London was then 168 per cent., which, when remitted to London, and vested there in bills on Holland, (the exchange there being

MARCH, 1803.

Sale of Bank Stock.

H. of R.

ten guilders eight stivers the pound sterling,) would, with commission and other charges, make the guilder cost forty-three and a half cents."

He also states that the only considerable offer he had received was that by Mr. Baring, and one from the Manhattan Bank, which bank offered to remit the whole at the rate of forty-three cents the guilder; the other banks, I believe, declined undertaking to furnish bills or payment in Holland on any terms. The Secretary, then, had to choose either to take the offer of the Manhattan Company, of forty-three cents the guilder, or to remit through London, which, he states, would have cost forty-three cents and a half the guilder, or to take Mr. Baring's offer of forty-one cents the guilder, payable in bank stock, at five hundred and eighty dollars each share, of four hundred dollars original cost. The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund preferred the latter. The gentleman says, they ought to have preferred the six hundred dollars each share, and to have purchased bills therewith. But, to what purpose, sir? We had money enough in the Treasury, we wanted not money at home; we wanted to place money in Holland. Had we sold the stock at six hundred dollars, still we should have been exactly as when we began. Bills to the required amount were not procurable; the debt in Holland would not have been paid, and our credit would have suffered. Would that have given the gentleman and his friends pleasure? I know not, Mr. Speaker; but I well recollect that the gentleman and his friends when the bill (making provision for the payment of the whole of the public debt) was under consideration, objected—nay, warmly objected, to that provision which authorized a new loan in Holland intended only to be resorted to, in case bills to meet our payments in Holland could not be procured. Those gentlemen then reprobated the idea of borrowing in Holland, and now complain, because a loan there was not resorted to, in preference to the sale of bank stock. Had it been resorted to, those very gentlemen would have told us, that it was easy to pay off old debts by creating new. But the bank stock, the gentleman says, was an active stock, giving an interest or dividend of eight per cent., and has been sold to pay a debt, bearing an interest of six per cent. The gentleman has been unfortunate. He presumes too much on the late hour he has chosen to introduce his resolution and his speech. What is the fact? A share of bank stock which gives, he says, eight per cent., he ought to have told us that the eight per cent. was on the original cost of the stock, say on four hundred dollars, giving an annual dividend of thirty-two dollars the share, has been sold for five hundred and eighty dollars, and stops therewith an interest of six per cent. per annum, of thirty-four dollars and eighty cents, which gives an annual gain of interest to the United States of two dollars and eighty cents on each bank share; besides, it lessens the principal of the debt of the United States the difference between four hundred dollars and five hundred and eighty dollars, or nearly fifty per cent. on that transaction; for, let it be remembered that we owed to the bank, and applied an equal amount of money, then in the Treasury, to pay off the bank; that is, we received for the two thousand two hundred and twenty bank shares, the sum of $1,287,600, and paid of the principal of the debt due the bank $1,290,000. Thus liberating us from a debt due to an institution that has been indulged with immense advantages—I mean that of having all the deposits of the United States exclusively within its vaults—an advantage which, according to the gentleman's account, it has not merited, and which, I trust, will, ere long, be extended in due proportion to banks which have been equally useful, and which will be at least equally as friendly to our Government as that bank has been.

The gentleman, Mr. Speaker, has been mistaken in his calculations; he states that the difference or loss on the sales between five hundred and eighty dollars, at which the two thousand two hundred and twenty shares of bank stock were sold, and the six hundred dollars at which they might have been sold, was $119,000.

[Here Mr. BAYARD arose and said, he meant including the two dividends, amounting to $75,000, which Mr. Baring received before he had to pay the money in Holland.]

Mr. SMITH continued. I admit the gentleman has a right to correct his statement. I presume the figures have been furnished him; but, sir, he is mistaken; the United States lost nothing thereby, for, immediately after the Secretary closed the bargain with Mr. Baring, he caused payment to be made to the bank of an equal sum (as I have shown) and thus stopped an interest, equal, at least, to the dividend which Mr. Baring would receive. It follows, then, that the gentleman should have stated the loss at forty-four thousand dollars, being twenty dollars the share on the 2,220 shares sold.

Mr. Baring made the purchase after the 7th of June, and had to put our bankers in Holland in cash, in the month of January, February, and March, and part in June following. But, sir, there was an advantage by the sale of Mr. Baring to the United States, which the gentleman has not mentioned. I mean the security of the payment in Holland; for, sir, if I am rightly informed, he does not obtain a transfer of the stock until the money is paid in Holland, and he has given good security for the contract; so that the payment being secured without possible loss, may and ought to be considered as equal to two or two and a half per cent. on the whole sum. We have already suffered so severely by bills being protested, as to enable us to form some estimate of the risk.

Merchants' commission for endorsing bills is generally $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The real difference, then, between the \$580 the share and \$600 makes a sum, on 2,220 shares, of \$44,400, which the gentleman calls a loss. This apparent loss is more than made up by the forty-one cents per guilder at which the remittance was made, and the forty-three cents asked by the Manhattan Bank; for the sake of calculation we will call it five per cent.; five per cent. saved on the amount of sales—say \$1,287,000 is \$64,380—making a gain of nearly \$20,000 in favor of the sale made by the Commissioners. But, sir, the Commissioners have a just right to claim credit of five per cent. on the whole sum due in Holland in 1803—say on \$2,347,000; for, sir, it is a well known fact that the merchants who hold money in Holland, declined selling, and held back their bills; they knew well the immense sum wanted by Government, and were certain that the Secretary would be compelled to give a high exchange. Nor did they sell in any large amounts until the transaction with Mr. Baring was known; they then knew that Government were no longer in their power, and they came forward and supplied all the exchange that was wanting at the same price allowed Mr. Baring—say 41 cents the guilder. Again, I repeat, that the sale to Mr. Baring enabled the Secretary to purchase the residue of the bills required, at less than he otherwise would, and therefore that the Commissioners ought to have the five per cent. credit on the \$2,347,000, being a gain to the United States of - - - - - \$117,350 00

Being a gain, by the judicious management of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, of seventy-two thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars; between the sum actually paid for the discharge of the Dutch debt in 1803, and the offer made by the Manhattan Company. But the gentleman says, that due pains were not taken to purchase; that the desire to purchase was not made public. Sir, the gentleman is mistaken; I believe the Bank of the United States was employed in the purchase, and all its branches; I presume they made it public, because it was their duty. I know that the cashier of the Branch Bank of Baltimore gave it every possible publicity, for he advertised for bills in the public newspapers. No favoritism, as has been hinted, was given; the price was fixed, and the cashier could neither give more nor less; all shared alike who had bills to sell, as will be seen when the accounts are rendered at the next session. But the gentleman says, if bills on Holland were not procurable, the payment might have been made through London. The Secretary states, and I believe him correct, that it could not been done at less than forty-two and a half cents the guilder, calculating exchange on London at 168 per cent., and from London on Amsterdam at ten guilders, eight stivers the pound sterling. The gentleman denies that those were the exchanges at the time; he quotes his information from persons he declines to name; and this anonymous authority he wishes the House to admit in preference to the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury. The gentleman quotes the exchange in March, April, and May last, as being under par; which I doubt; but what had the gentleman to do with those months? The Secretary made the report on the 7th of June, on which the Commissioners were to act. He quotes the exchange then on London, to be 168 per cent., or nearly one per cent. above par.

Now, sir, suppose the Commissioners had directed payment to be made there; London, at 168 per cent. the guilder, would have cost, at that exchange, forty-three and a half per cent. the guilder. But what would have been their mortification when they would have found, as was the fact, that exchange rose rapidly to 170 per cent., and best bills actually sold in Baltimore at 172½ per cent.? Had Government entered into the purchase of bills to the amount they required, I have no hesitation in believing that exchange would have risen to 175 per cent.

The gentleman states, also, from his anonymous authority, that the exchange on Holland was not fairly quoted by the Secretary in his report. Sir, the Secretary's information was from the Messrs. Willink, the known bankers of the United States at Amsterdam. Those gentlemen being the correspondents of my house, I can practically say, that the Secretary's information was substantially correct. But exchange fluctuates continually, and no person ought to be accountable for changes therein.
